Secretary Ickes sought then to offset the Atlanta ultimatum by tendering funds, taxpayer's money, to the city of Atlanta equal to the amount he thought the city would receive in taxes. Again, Mr. McCarl stepped in. He said that since the property was owned by the federal government it was not subject to taxes and therefore a payment to the city of Atlanta out of federal funds constituted a gratuity. In other words, it was an illegal proposition.

The comptroller general's ruling was so definite and positive that those who have been boosting and boasting about low cost housing projects have been stunned. Frankly, they do not know which way to turn. Thus far, they have not discovered a ray of light to lead them. The housing projects are held in abeyance.

The housing project situation brings to the fore a condition which apparently had not been generally recognized. It relates, of course, to the general subject of taxation but it has a bearing upon many policies now operative and which, it is fair to say, have been described by President Roosevelt as experimental. Since they are experimental, it seems to me they ought to be examined from this taxation phase.

Enter Taxation

One can understand readily the base of the objection. There is hardly a city or town or even any other kind of taxing district in the United States where the tax rates are not at the very peak which the people can carry. That was shown most vividly a year ago when Congress thought it necessary to enact legislation permitting municipalities the privilege of declaring themselves virtually bankrupts and according them the right of compromising with their bondholders under a decree of a United States court. So, when we think of taking away taxable property in any city and making it non-taxable by conversion from private to federal government ownership, we see how it adds a further burden of taxes to the remaining privately owned property. That is the reason why many municipalities are fearful of government ownership of railroads, for example, since the railroads are heavy taxpayers in every community they serve. Laying aside the question of merit or lack of merit in the proposition of government ownership of railroads, no municipality can afford to overlook the loss of tax receipts that would follow government acquisition of those carrier properties. They pay real estate taxes in the United States annually of more than three hundred million dollars. Of course it is distributed in thousands of places but whatever the amount may be in your community or any other, it represents a tax source which the local government can ill afford to lose.

It is the same, although to a lesser degree, with respect to the housing project. In this statement I mean only as to the local tax phase. It has, however, another very important tax angle. Property, or the income from property, everywhere is subjected to three tax assessments. First, the county or city in which the property is located takes a tax toll; second, the state gets a share, and thirdly, the federal government either by income or some other tax gets its hand into the pocket of a property owner.

In the case of the low cost housing project, it was necessary to calculate the rental rate on a base so low that it would be impossible for the total receipts to pay off the government investment. This had to be done if the low cost housing was to be supplied at a rate the poorer classes could pay. It is seen, therefore, that there was a deficit staring the project in the face. To meet this deficit certain federal funds were to be set aside regularly which, coupled with the receipts from the tenants, would serve to amortize the original cost. From the standpoint of liquidating the cost of the building, this is fine but it does not impress one as being so wholesome when it is shown that the government's contribution comes out of the general fund of the Treasury which in turn comes out of the general taxpayers of the nation.

And so it is with a great many other of the experiments where such programs place government-owned agencies or industries in competition with citizens. Take the Tennessee Valley hydro-electric project for another example. The federal government has placed more than $131,000,000 in that venture. The present Tennessee Valley Corporation has taken over these properties at about one-third of this amount—a net loss to the government. But that is not all. The vast project that has been developed in the Tennessee valley and through the adjoining counties and cities is not subject to state taxation nor do the cities that are being served by Tennessee river electricity get any taxes from this source. It may be sound in the theory but I am fearful that the inbred opposition to federal government encroachment on local affairs sooner or later will cause a new explosion. It will come from the original feeling that state's rights ought to be superior to federal rights except where states have delegated that authority to the federal government in the national Constitution.

* * *

Earlier in this discussion I mentioned the ruling by Comptroller General McCarl who acted, of course, as the head of the general accounting office. This agency was created with a very definite purpose in mind. Congress wanted some independent group or authority to watch all federal expenditures to make certain that they were made in accordance with law. A good many years ago when this job was done by the comptroller of the treasury, it was not infrequent that an adverse ruling by the comptroller put the comptroller in a tough spot.

Always the Goat

Mr. McCarl is not popular. Privately and publicly, he has been criticized, sometimes in language hardly printable. These complaints always have come from someone whose idea of spending money was found by Mr. McCarl not to be in accordance with the law. Always, he was the goat.

He has been the goat much more under the New Deal than ever before. Every time he kicks over a New Deal plan, the sponsors of that plan brand him as a Tory or a Reactionary or as being just plain dumb. He has engaged in controversy with none of them. He has contended that his decisions were rendered in accordance with the law which he was directed by congress to construe. But it is true of all humans. When a pet plan is destroyed, one tries to find somebody upon whom the blame can be pinned.

An Observation

I believe it is no wrong observation, that persons of genius, and those who are most capable of Art, are always most fond of Nature; and as such are chiefly sensible, that all Art consists in the imitation of Nature. On the contrary, people of the common level of understanding are principally delighted with the little niceties and fantastical operations of Art, and constantly think that finest which is least natural.—Pope.

HUNTING WALRUS IN THE ARCTIC A COMMUNAL AFFAIR

The Alaskan method of hunting walrus in the Arctic is extremely communal. Some of the men in kayaks—the skin boats just large enough for one occupant—take after the big beast and hurl their harpoons into it. The harpoon is in reality a spear with a loose point to which is attached a line ending in a bladder, to keep the walrus afloat after it is dead. Also attached to the line is a kind of drift anchor made of hide stretched across a square wooden frame, which prevents the walrus from traveling too far.

After the harpoon point is secured in the animal's skin, the killing must be done with spears which penetrate the lungs and intestines. This takes time, skill and bravery, as the natives cannot hurl the heavy spears from a great distance, and if the spear sticks in the walrus without killing it, the hunter has to row close enough to the prey to get his spear again, which is very dangerous.

It is always great fun to haul a walrus to shore and cut it up. Every man gets his share, and he knows from long precedent exactly what portion is his. The man who thrusts the first harpoon into the animal is the owner and receives the credit. For this he takes the head, the heart, the left flipper and the guts. Number two takes the right forepart; number three the left rear portion, and so on. I was lucky the first time and secured a forepart because I had killed the animal after some one else had harpooned it.—Peter Freuchen in Cosmopolitan.

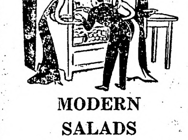
Seeking Wealth

"Many strive for wealth," said Hi Ho, the sage of Chinatown, "in the hope of doing good, but encounter a new and fierce competition among those who seek to become beneficiaries."

The Weather

The weather the past week has been nice and mild. South winds have forced the snow to pack down under a warm sun.

The highways are clear and sideroads are open.



MODERN SALADS Made with MEAT

DO you like to explore? Chart your course for frigid places—like refrigerators. Collect your crew of hearty mates who like to go places of an evening, and who like good foods when the evening is done.

If the refrigerator holds a tempting meat salad—you're in luck. Ham loaf, chicken, corned beef and other canned meats—these are the foods that stick to explorers' ribs after an evening of dancing or skating or driving in the open. Tossed lightly together with crisp greens, they are not only good—they're dietetic.

Dishes Worth Discovering

Meat and Cucumber Salad Loaf: Soften one tablespoon gelatin in two tablespoons cold water and dissolve in one cup of canned tomato juice which has been brought to the boiling point. Add one teaspoon lemon juice, and salt and pepper to taste. When cool and beginning to thicken, add one-half cup of mayonnaise, two cups of finely cut meat, one cup diced cucumbers and two tablespoons chopped pickle relish. (The meat may be one cup of canned ham loaf plus the contents of one 6-ounce can of chicken, or equal quantities of canned ham loaf and veal loaf). Pour into wet oblong mold and chill. Turn out on a platter and garnish as desired. Serve in slices on crisp lettuce. This serves eight persons.

Chicken and Fruit Salad: Marinate the contents of two 6-ounce cans of chicken in French dressing for about an hour. Add two-thirds cup of canned grapefruit pulp, two-thirds cup canned diced pineapple and one-half cup nuts, and moisten with mayonnaise. Serve in popover or cream puff shells. This serves eight persons.*

Colorful FRUIT SALADS Provide a "Lift"

BRIGHT warm colors do things for us when autumn rolls around. They buck up our spirits for chilly days to come—a pagan inheritance perhaps. Nature knows about that and weaves out-of-doors a flaming tapestry to flaunt in the face of October winds. Indoors, we light a log-fire and candles which catch the highlights in our warmer rugs and draperies. It's a cozy sort of comfort.

Friends drop in—for a game, for a chat, or just to be companionable over the knitting needles which are weaving bright, warm winter togs. And what have you? What have you to serve for these pleasant chatty moments, when there's no time to fuss over foods?

We Nominate Salads

If you're a good pagan, you know how to put bright warm colors and delicious exhilarating flavors into fruit salads. Pagans weren't salad fans, so far as we know, but it is recorded that they did worship the harvest goddess. They heaped up red and gold and russet fruits and no doubt mingled them for the sheer glory of bright color and glowing flavor.

Autumn salads, gay with the gold of peaches, the amber of pineapple and the red of tomato, can be quickly made in the morning, put away in your refrigerator all ready to emerge for luncheon, tea—or saved for dinner if there is no call for them to be served sooner. Experiment—play with some of the new colorful salads, and see how much zest they add to your autumn menus.

For Example

Jellied Pineapple and Peach Salad: Dissolve one package of lemon jello in one cup boiling water and add one-half cup of canned peach syrup and one-half cup of canned pineapple syrup. When cold and ready to set, add one cup of diced canned peaches and one cup of drained crushed pineapple. Add one-half cup chopped nuts and one-half cup chopped dates and mold as desired. Serve cold on crisp lettuce with mayonnaise. Serves eight.

Tulip Salad: Polish eight medium-size apples having bright red skins. Cut a slice from stem ends and scoop out the centers. Now cut down in wide points to represent tulip petals. Mix one-half cup diced apple from the centers, one cup diced canned pears, three-fourths cup diced celery and three-fourths cup chopped salted almonds. Moisten well with mayonnaise. Fill the tulips with this and set in nests of lettuce. This serves eight persons.

Still More Fruits

Pear and Tomato Salad: Slice chilled ripe tomatoes and place one slice in each of eight individual nests of lettuce. Place half of a canned pear on top of each, having the cut side of the pear up. Mix one cream cheese with three tablespoons chili sauce and pile in the pear cavities. Garnish with strips of canned pimiento and serve with either mayonnaise or French dressing. Serves eight.

Banana Boat Salad: Cut bananas in halves lengthwise and scoop out the centers. Fill the cavities with a mixture of diced pineapple slices and chopped black walnuts moistened with mayonnaise. Garnish with several maraschino cherries which have been dipped in mayonnaise and then rolled in canned moist cocoanut.

Fruit Salad Dressing: Mix together two tablespoons lemon juice, six tablespoons olive oil, two tablespoons bottled lime juice, two tablespoons confectioner's sugar, salt and pepper to taste, a little paprika and a few grains of mustard. Shake until emulsified.*

Opposition To Mud Lake Area Project Grows Fast

The Mud Lake condemnation proceedings came in for further discussion this week as correspondence between E. V. Willard, state conservation commissioner and E. M. Evans, attorney and farmer of Middle River, one of the leaders in the opposition to the Mud Lake Project was made public.

In his reply to the conservation commissioner, Mr. Evans makes a dramatic appeal for the people of the Mud Lake area and shows how the business of the towns near the area will be materially reduced.

The adjoining territory will be made uninhabitable because of the mosquito pests that will be brought back by inundating these swamps again, Mr. Evans states.

Mr. Willard's letter and Mr. Evans' reply will be found on enclosed supplement.

1935 Minnesota Hunting Season Closed Tuesday

Tuesday, November 19, brot the 1935 open game bird hunting seasons to a close in Minnesota, A. C. Hanson, Director of the Division of Game and Fish, warned. At 4 p. m. on that day, the legal season for the taking of migratory waterfowl came to a close and sunset marked the end of the open periods for the taking of ringnecked pheasants and bob-white quail.

Action taken by the Minnesota Conservation Commission after careful study of a survey made by state game wardens, sportsmen's organizations and interested individuals ends any possibility of an open season on big game in the state this year, Director Hanson stated.

Reports of deer poaching reaching the office of the Game and Fish division from certain northern sections of the state brought action for the concentration of game wardens in an effort to halt illegal deer hunting. Transfer of wardens to districts where deer poaching complaints are most numerous will be brought about before the end of the week with Martin J. O'Toole, chief warden, in direct charge.

"We are going to "crack down" on the bootlegger of venison and the illicit beaver traffic that is alleged to be going on by sending in strange game wardens who will be able to more successfully cope with local situations," Mr. Hanson said.

To aid in better enforcement of laws dealing with game and fish, the Minnesota Conservation Commission has recommended setting up of a 'flying squadron' that can be quickly shifted to any part of the state where prompt action may be necessary because of emergency conditions. Six men will be selected upon the basis of experience, efficiency and fearlessness. This new feature of game and fish law enforcement will be organized as soon as possible. This fast-moving unit will be used to combat deer violations, illegal beaver and other fur trapping, and bootlegging of fish taken contrary to law. It will become a permanent unit in law enforcement agencies of the state division.

Ole Wrolson Was Killed In Threshing Accident Oct. 20

Word was received here this week from Mc Lennan, Alberta, Canada, that Ole Wrolson, a former Holt resident had been killed in threshing accident at Wanham, Alberta. Mr. Wrolson was fatally injured while operating a threshing machine on a farm for one of his neighbors on October 20.

The news dispatch states that a bundle team drove into one of the belts on the separator, causing it to fly off. The belt wound around the left arm and body of Wrolson, completely severing the left arm from his body and breaking his jaw in two places.

The injured man was given first aid at a nursing home in his home town by a doctor and nurse and was later taken to a hospital at Grand Praire, a long distance from there.

The roads were in bad shape and the trip took a long time which, besides the shock, proved too much for the injured man. He passed away on Monday, October, 21st.

Mr. Wrolson lived here at Holt with his family in 1920-22, moving to Canada a short time after that. He was married to Gena Knutson, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert Knutson, former pioneer residents of Holt and and community.

Mr. Wrolson had farmed in the Wanham community for the past eight years. He leaves his wife and five children.

CCC Camp With 200 Men To Open At Mud Lake

While northwest hunters have been bagging their annual allotment of wild birds, civilian conservation camps have been working toward a bigger annual crop of wild fowl and better shooting in the future, it was announced recently in Washington.

A review of the activities of the biological survey showed today that four migratory waterfowl refuges were being constructed in North Dakota with CCC labor and one each in Minnesota and Wisconsin.

A 200-man camp now being established in Marshall county, will assist in the construction of Mud Lake refuge. Pending the settlement of land acquisition difficulties, the workers are occupied on a state project in the nearby Thief Lake area.

The camp work at Mud Lake will consist of cutting fire lanes, improving forest stands, clearing timber for flooding, building dykes and dams, constructing truck trails, fences and telephone lines, and planting food and cover for birds.

Church Sale Brings $169.80

The largest crowd ever to attend a church sale here, was at the Nazarete Lutheran Ladies' Aid sale at the church basement on Friday evening. There were many beautiful pieces of handwork and home made quilts put up for sale and the crowd of bidders did a nice job of securing them.

The net proceeds from the sale of articles was $129.05 and the amount brought in by the sale of lunches was $30.75. This made a total of $159.80.

The Dorcas girls sold candy and popcorn of which the proceeds were $7.45.

The Ladies' Aid wishes to extend their thanks to all who cooperated in making the sale a success.

Miss Clara Sandberg returned home last week from the hospital in Roseau where she had an operation for appendicitis.

Eavesdropping on the "Monticello Party Line"

The Monticello Party Line is an unusual new radio program, recently begun on a series of middle-western and southern stations. It is unique in that all of the action takes place over the party line—and the listener is simply "eavesdropping" on the fun, the daily activities, the occasional troubles that keep the people of Monticello busy on the line.

Washington Digest

National Topics Interpreted
By WILLIAM BRUCKART
NATIONAL PRESS BLDG. WASHINGTON, D. C.

Washington.—About this time every fall, the President calls the director of the budget to the White House and they go into a huddle about the finances of the government, about the needs for money of the various governmental agencies who must pay their employees and the other expenses to which they are put and in addition they discuss general questions of policy. It is, as I said, an annual affair that presages a new tempo in the movement of activities in Washington because it occurs some weeks in advance of the reconvening of congress. Congress, under the Constitution, must appropriate the money which is spent by all branches of government.

In Huddle on Budget

Well, the annual huddle has just been held by President Roosevelt and Daniel W. Bell, acting director of the bureau of the budget, and Mr. Bell has gone back to his office in the treasury with instructions to begin formulation of budget estimates for submission to congress.

Of course, budget making goes on throughout the year. The huge staff of experts and accountants who work under Mr. Bell's direction are busy the year 'round examining the proposed requirements of the various agencies and arriving at conclusions as to what their needs reasonably should be. The White House conference, therefore, represents the second step because those were the figures that formed the basis of the discussion between the President and his budget director.

Problems to Solve

In drafting the budget for submission to the next session of congress, the administration is confronted with a variety of problems, not the least of which is the political phase. It is to be remembered that the budget now under consideration covers money that will be appropriated for use after July 1, 1936, and the succeeding 12 month period. Therefore, half of the Presidential campaign next year, indeed, the heated part of that campaign, will take place after governmental agencies have begun to use the new appropriations. It is easy to see, therefore, that politics can hardly be kept out of the forthcoming budget in some form or other even though every President says politics does not influence budget making. Nevertheless, New Deal spending and future taxation constitute questions which the President cannot overlook and is not overlooking because those things are vital to every man, woman and child in the nation.

It seems to be pretty well settled now that the Republicans are going to make spending and taxation their major ammunition against Mr. Roosevelt and his New Deal. In fact, it seems reasonably sure that the Republican slogan will be "Throw the Spendthrifts Out." That being the case, Mr. Roosevelt obviously must have in the back of his head considerable concern over the current budget making.

Knowing "Danny" Bell as I have known him for nearly 20 years, during which time he has grown up in the treasury service, I think it ought to be said in his favor that politics is farthest from his thoughts. He is as nearly a human figuring machine as any man I have known in my Washington career except possibly the man under whom he was trained, namely, the late Robert Hand. His chief concern is and always has been a determination to have accurate statistics, accurate conclusions and recommendations based as nearly as may be upon sound judgment.

But in saying these things about Mr. Bell I am not saying that budgetary plans are not subject to manipulation. It has been true in previous administrations and it is true in this one. The vast totals of figures with their minima of explanations are never easy to understand. This is one way of saying that they can be made to conceal a great deal more than they reveal.

* * *

Spending, Taxation

I mentioned the issues of spending and taxation. The American Liberty League which has consistently warned about the possibility of future heavy taxation has not been silent since the President some weeks ago made public a pre-budgetary summation. The League insists that while present tax rates soon will provide enough money to meet what the President terms as "ordinary" expenditures of the government, the rates are insufficient to meet the spending which Mr. Roosevelt calls extraordinary in that it covers relief. Further, the League, in a statement the other day, asserted its belief that the present tax level was high enough to meet "legitimate relief if present unsound spending policies are abandoned." But it is emphasized by the league that even "if unsound spending policies are abandoned," the present tax levels are insufficient to make possible any appreciable retirement of the gigantic debt that has been built up through the New Deal relief program.

So it is easy to see that a head-on collision between two schools of thought is inevitable. Mr. Roosevelt and his brain trusters have contended and will continue to contend that federal spending in the volume that has taken place was the only means by which the nation could be carried over this period of depression. On the other hand there will be the vicious attacks of Republican campaigners, the shots by such men as Lewis Douglas, former director of the bureau of the budget, who broke with Mr. Roosevelt over "reckless spending," and all of those groups of which the Liberty League is typical. These have plenty of campaign material, and you can make sure that they will use it.

My experience as an observer of politics and government prompts me to say that there is nothing that strikes the heart of the average taxpayer quite so fundamentally as displays of waste with the accompaniment of forecasts of greater taxation. Thus, if the New Deal opposition goes ahead on the course that appears to be charted for them—actually it is made to order for them—they can cause the administration many anxious moments. I say this, knowing full well, that the administration has much argument on its side and that it is equipped with the finest layout of machinery for influencing public opinion that any administration ever has had. It has at its command all of the machinery used in crop production control, the thousands of persons on the federal pay roll and the millions who believe Mr. Roosevelt is earnestly seeking to make this a better country in which to live. It is, therefore, no small task for the New Deal opposition if it is to succeed even in turning the New Deal strength in the house of representatives to anything near an even distribution of the seats.

New Deal Opposition

Apparently, New Deal opposition will be concentrated as much in the congressional districts as against the President himself. The reasons are simple. First, the senate is going to remain Democratic whether Mr. Roosevelt is re-elected or defeated. Only one-third of the 96 senators come up for re-election next year and the bulk of these are from normally Democratic states. Unless a cataclysm follows the Democratic party, the senate majority for the Democrats will continue to be ample.

Such is not the case in the house of representatives where the entire membership must seek election every two years. There are in the house membership probably as many as 75 Democrats who can be called pure political accidents. That is, they were elected from districts which are normally Republican during the landslide that swept Mr. Roosevelt into office. A considerable number of these naturally will be retired by the voters just as a considerable number of Republicans were retired after they had held house seats in the early 1920's by virtue of election in the Harding landslide. Consequently, changes may be expected in the house New Deal strength. In concentrating the fight in congressional districts, the New Deal opposition is battling for position. If the New Deal majority in the house can be whittled down, it will then become impossible for the President to drive through his program of legislation as he has done in the last three sessions. From the Republican standpoint, this would be important since it would place Mr. Roosevelt in much the same position that President Hoover found himself in the last half of his administration when he had an adverse congress on his hands. No political leader likes that situation.

When the New Deal opposition jumps onto the questions of spending and taxation, therefore, and when it goes back to the grass roots of congressional districts, it takes no stretch of the imagination to see that a real political fight lies ahead. Developments between now and the nominating conventions next June may change the general perspective.

Washington on Rights

While several of the federal courts, including the Supreme court of the United States, are considering questions revolving around President Roosevelt's program for development of Muscle Shoals in the Tennessee river as an electrical power project, government owned, a newly discovered letter written by President George Washington takes on unusual interest. "It seems that even in 1791, there was argument about the development of Muscle Shoals. The letter, which was addressed to the attorney general of the United States at that time, called attention to the efforts being made by individuals to effect trades with Indians and suggested the necessity for federal laws that would afford some protection for the Indians in their dealings with the white men. It will be remembered, of course, that the Tennessee river valley in those days was populated by Indians but the problem that existed then exists today, namely, protection of the rights of the individual.

Sculptor Loses Fortune and Bemoans His Fate

A talented young sculptor was the last to arrive at the party. He seemed gloomy and dejected and the smile was missing from his usually cheerful countenance. As he seated himself beside the Woman she found it unnecessary to ask the cause for his dejection, for he immediately informed her ruefully, "I lost $2,500 today."

The Woman was surprised. Although he is a talented young man he has not yet reached the stage in his career where he can turn his talent into a means of livelihood. He has difficulty selling his work and the woman never would have suspected that he owned so much money. She said nothing and he continued, "I'm so mad at myself. It's all my own fault, too."

Her curiosity prompted her to put the question for which he was waiting. "What happened?" she asked.

He seemed glad to unburden his troubled soul. "I wanted to bet on the horse that came in first today and if I had, I'd have won $2,500. But I didn't have the $12 to put on him—darn it. I'm as mad as hops at myself—all that money lost."—New York Sun.

"ART OF BORING" IN SEVEN VOLUMES; WE DON'T NEED IT

To whet our appetites he mentioned the scholarly bore, the funny bore, the story telling or reminiscing bore, etc., etc., etc.

We really don't need seven volumes to tell us how to bore people, nor even one. For all the bores you can possibly think of come easily under one head. If you want to emulate them you need do but one thing—talk about what interests you rather than stop to think what will interest the person you are talking to.

The man who talks about himself does that. Sometimes its about his success, how he did thus and so, sometimes its about how a stupid world kept him from being successful or happy.

The wise-cracking bore and the reminiscing bore and the superior, pedantic bore, they are all doing that—talking about what interests them only.

That's their way of enjoying people. Then don't they care, you may ask, about whether people enjoy them? Of course they care. There isn't the most unmitigated bore alive who if he could help it would enjoy himself at the cost of boring people. The point is they just don't stop to consider that side of it.

And come to think of it, the person who does not use others for an audience but who enjoys others by drawing them out, really gets so much more out of his contacts. If the others tried that way they would never go back to boring people.

SYNOPSIS

Following his father's criticism of his idle life, and withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, son of a wealthy banker, practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which he must reach at once, from New York, takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis. Other members include an attractive girl, Barry Trafford; middle-aged Giles Kerrigan; Sister Anastasia, a nun; and an individual whom he instinctively dislikes, Martin Crack. Barry's reticence annoys him. To Kerrigan he takes at once, but he distrusts Crack. He finds his intimacy with Kerrigan ripening, and makes a little progress with Barry. Through a misunderstanding, Hal is directed to Barry's bedroom, instead of his own, and they exchange kisses. Next day he tells her he loves her. She only answers that she mustn't love him. Crack brutally insults Kerrigan. Hal forces him to apologize abjectly. On his insistence, Barry tells Hal that, at her father's urging, she had married a man many years older than she, and had promised her father, on his deathbed, to stick to her husband, "no matter what happened," for ten yetrs. That was four years ago, and despite her knowledge of her husband's unworthiness, she is determined to keep her promise, though admitting her love for Hal. No argument he can make will move Barry. That night she begs him, in a note, not to insist on seeing her, as he has declared he will. He disregards her missive, and goes to her, in her room.

As if he had expected it, he pushed the paper into his pocket, said good night to the clerk, and went upstairs. There was light around Barry's door and he knocked softly. He heard the bed creak, her deliberate footfalls come, her low, resigned voice admit she knew who was there even as she asked.

"Barry, you've got to come out," he said.

"Hal, no," she said, gently pleading.

"Then I'll come in." He pushed the door, and as if she had expected that too, he felt her weight against it.

"Don't, Hal," she said, less surely; "for the love of heaven, please don't. I'll come out to you—for five minutes."

"No," said Hal. "If you come out, there'll be no conditions. And if you don't come out, I come in."

"Hal, I'm tired; I've got a headache—please, oh, please, my darling."

"You haven't a headache, and you'll forget you're tired. Barry, I'm serious as death, as sin, as happiness; if you won't come to me, I'll come to you. Do you understand that?"

He waited a few seconds for her to speak again; then he pushed the door against her strength until she dropped back from it and he stood inside, closing it behind him. There was no key, nor any eye for the bolt to engage, so he left it and faced her.

She turned from him as if the room had grown too small, murmuring, "Dear G—d, if you haven't given me a way to keep him out, you must want him here."

Hal took her arm above the elbow and turned her to him, then held her other arm too and shook her once, gently, to stir the heavy-lidded study that held her eyes. "You believe there is God?" he said.

"If I do," she said, meeting his look steadily, "you don't know better than I what he wants of me."

Her chin was up bravely over where the parting of the little stiffened collar showed her white, firm throat; between the turbulent bushes where her golden hair ended, her cheeks drew a little inward to compose her full lips in their faintly pursed pride.

As he held her before him by the arms and looked into the living blue of her eyes—deeply strengthened against him, yet never blind to the wonder of what had occurred—there fell suddenly across his heart a bad shadow, as if somewhere a silent signal for hurry had been made. His voice sounded too slow, too undisciplined for his quickened purposes as he said to her: "Angel of heaven, it's nothing to tell you I'd die for you—is it. Love is as much as you said it was, so that all its old meanings have fallen away and I can speak it only to tell you I love you; and to say I love you so much I'd die for you is nothing more—is it."

His voice made no inquiry, but his eyes waited upon hers for the known answer. Her quiet golden head moved a little aside and back again, and her deep look gravely understood him.

"Barry, do you love me?"

She looked down at the mouth that had asked her that, then back at his eyes as her bare whisper said, "You know it: God forgive me for letting you."

"You'd never need to tell me you loved me so much you'd die for me—would you."

"No," she said.

"You'd mean me to know you would, just by saying you loved me—wouldn't you."

"Yes."

Without changing the composure of his tone he said: "But you won't shake off the wrong slavery of a spurious bargain with your father and with a man who has no claim upon you; you won't risk a little time of trouble in your conscience, of unrest in your disillusioned duty to a figure of love that had his best life in your own fancy as a child; you'd die for me, but you won't do this other, won't even willingly listen to me tell you why you must, how you can."

She looked at him, the dark awe of alarm taking her eyes more deeply: she said nothing. But under the very heart of her look, he saw a shining, liquid fullness that had come so slowly she herself might not have felt it. And before the tears could form, he had her—warm and mortal—in his arms.

"That's it," he whispered, feeling her soft cheek wet against his. "You cry, and when you're cool and calm again, I'll show you the simple, honorable, little things that are all we need to do to have the world—to ourselves, for always."

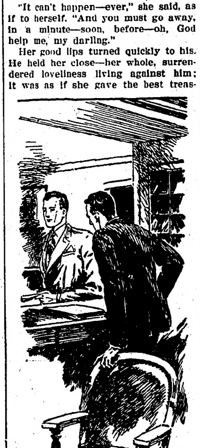
Clear footfalls ringing on the sidewalk opposite reminded Hal that the lighted room must be in plain view of anyone who cared to look at the windows. But one of the shades wouldn't stay down; so, back at the door, he cursed the impossibility of locking it, and turned out the light.

The glow of the street against the ceiling showed the meager furniture, and Barry waiting for him. He went to her.

"It can't happen—ever," she said, as if to herself. "And you must go away, in a minute—soon, before—oh, God help me, my darling."

Her good lips turned quickly to his. He held her close—her whole, surrendered loveliness living against him; it was as if she gave the best treasures of her life to the keeping of his exultant body, as if their nearness found its way of growth to inseparable communion, miraculous and destined both. She would forget he must go; and he knew he must not.



As If He Had Expected It, He Pushed the Paper Into His Pocket.

A quick, single creak was all the warning that came from the hall, bringing Hal to a sense of time elapsed, to sharp, premonitory alertness. Doc's ugly growl was begun as the door-latch clicked; it broke into a sharp bark at the sound of a step in the room; and the door crisply closed again. A key scraped metal, found the keyhole, and turned the lock over, plucked smartly out again. Then the snap of the switch put light in the frugal room, and Hal was looking into Martin Crack's light-blue eyes, their lazy, private smiling harassed by a rattish intensity, as of hate and fear and triumph all together. Only his voice was still drowsy as he said, "I kinda thought it'd be tonight."

For a moment Hal was afraid that the bursting of hot poisons in him must blind him, gag him, nauseate him beyond any power to act.

"You little snooping son of a—cat!" he said, the heavy savagery of his voice somehow saved from trembling. "What're you doing here?"

Indolently Crack's hand slipped into his side pocket: Hal knew the sight of that evil little golf ball would snap the last shackle on his control; but Crack drew out a stubby double-derringer to point at him, and a small, preposterous agent of reason remaining in Hal noted how that old-fashioned weapon suited Crack's old-fashioned tidiness.

"You guess what I'm doin'," said Crack in sly, almost sensual mischief.

The bed creaked. Hal became aware of his arms, hanging down beside him, drained of certainty, ready to tremble, as after great effort. Then the physical revulsion under his fury abruptly choked itself, left him to a numb, miserable disgust, a tainted exhaustion of blood that would pass for calm. And in it there throbbed only one sure emotion to command such faculties as were undrugged—hatred of Crack, steady and uncomplicated, seeming to live independent of Crack's hate of him, Crack's private gloating in his degradation. Hal heard his own voice quiet and careless in contempt as he nodded at the derringer: "You don't need that d—n silly thing."

Crack put it away, brief embarrassment bringing some of the drowsiness back to his eyes. "Thought you'd prob'ly be sensible," he said.

"You did," said Hal drily. "And what's there to be sensible about?" The small check in Crack's return to basking satisfaction did Hal good.

Hal looked at Barry. She sat on the edge of the bed, knees drawn up, legs tightly encircled by her arms, golden head a little bowed over her dark, sullen stare at the washstand in the corner.

"Well," said Crack, with a sort of sly modesty in achievement: "we can use dough an' we can use publicity. You got the say which."

"You'll have a h—l of a time getting money," Hal said out of his listless calm, "so shoot on the other, if you think it'll get you anywhere."

"I guess it'll get us somewheres all right," said Crack. "But I figgered Mr. Frederick Ireland'd sooner make it dough, if you wouldn't."

By G—d, what a dirty trick on the Old Man, getting him into a mess like this! . . . Shame like an instant of fright, held Hal's veins and made his lungs seem to shrink. Providence, you Ireland: Providence! Let a narrow, white bug leer at you in the rotten trap you walked into, and leave Providence to take care of the Old Man. Christmas! Leave Providence to take care of your hate, too. Look at Martin Crack, named for a saint, no doubt—look at him sitting there, a venomous lackey of evil: don't fight him, don't match your pristine wits against his basking viciousness, don't disturb your fine, wounded spirit now that the first fury is out of you.

Hal thanked God his revolted calm had stayed steady upon him till he saw what he must do. He could stall, somehow, for another day, until patient Sister Anastasia was delivered at her sorry destination; and in Los Angeles, a free agent, he would be his father's—his own Providence in this. In the room of a city hotel, alone with Crack, he might remember those immense, riven compositions in defiance through which they had minutely traveled, scenes in which it did not matter what happened to a man.

And while these flashing things tumbled past Hal's bitter attention, he said quietly, "If it interests you what Frederick Ireland would think, I'd ask him."

"You know him better'n I do," said Crack. "What do you figger he'll think?"

"How well do you know him?"

"Don't know him," said Crack; "but you'd ought to. You're his son, aren't you."

"Is that a statement?" Hal asked. "Or a request for information."

"Don't seem like you were exactly denyin' it."

"No," said Hal, "I don't remember having denied it, since I've known you."

He glanced at Barry as he reached for a cigarette. She hadn't stirred.

"You're Ireland's son," Crack said. "Frederick—the big whack."

"Sure," said Hal confidently.

"And you got no idea what he'll think when he hears you been caught in a married woman's room by her husband."

"If I told you what you didn't like, you wouldn't believe it," said Hal, as if Crack were being a little dull-witted about it.

The shy smile slipped over Crack's fair-skinned face again, and he said, "Look, Ireland, we don't want to get you in a lotta trouble." A hot swirling under Hal's composure made him hold himself hard; in Los Angeles, in the room alone with Crack, he would remember that "we."

"Well?" said Hal, "S'pose you don't."

"Here's the thing," Crack said: "if you'll talk dough, the whole works stops right here in this room—between the three of us. If you won't, we gotta go to Uncle Frederick. An' after that, it's court an' the newspapers."

"That's a program anyway," said Hal. "Push item number one off, and go to Mr. Ireland. Is that all you want to know?"

"Don't you wanta save yourself trouble?"

"Yes, you bet," said Hal, and the casual readiness of his own voice fortified him. "But I don't see any trouble."

"You don't," said Crack. "You don't wanna stop this right here?"

Hal welcomed with vicious pleasure the undertone of impatience. He said, "By paying you money?"

"Yes."

Hal puffed the fragment of a laugh through his nose and said, "Wouldn't pay you a nickel even if it meant anything to me."

"Maybe you don't think I know you're Ireland's son," said Crack, his voice breaking peevishly as he raised it.

"I haven't denied it yet," said Hal. "Anyone'd think you didn't want to go ahead with this."

Crack watched him again and liked it less. The cunning in his eyes tried for a space of minutes to challenge Hal's unworried look, then suddenly the peevishness blew to a hot ember of malice, hissing in his words like a coal settling through snow: "By G—d! If all this is wasted, I'll—" With one unguarded look of sweating hatred of Hal, he jerked a pencil and a telegraph form from his pocket and went to the bureau, elbows out, to write quickly at a message.

Muscle Bound

Several conditions are described by the term muscle bound, but perhaps the commonest is that by which muscles, through constant practice, are trained to oppose one another rather than to act together in efficient work. Thus, when a muscle is called into play involuntarily its opponent also contracts and the result is less efficient action. The condition can obviously be altered first by rest and then more efficient training of the muscles.

Farmer Makes Home of Tomb, Fears Only Rats

Back in 1880, Linus Smith designed and built a mausoleum near Medina, Ohio, to hold the bodies of his entire family. But only the remains of Smith's father, mother and younger brother ever were placed in this tomb. Soon after the body of the younger Smith was placed in the vault, the door at the entrance was broken down and the body stolen. An unsigned note offered return of it for $200. A neighbor youth was suspected, confessed the ghoulish act and returned the body. This occurrence turned Linus Smith against mausoleums and he transferred all three bodies to a cemetery. The vault, empty for years, now is occupied by Charles Ritter, bachelor farmer, who finds it quite a desirable place in which to live, cool in summer and warm in winter.

A chimney was built and a stove installed which Ritter uses for cooking and what heat he needs in winter. Ritter says he doesn't fear ghosts nearly as much as rats that like to share his strange home with him.—Capper's Weekly.

The world may be improving in some ways but in regards to human bondage it is growing steadily worse, according to figures gathered by Lady Simon, wife of Britain's foreign minister. There are three times as many slaves in the world today she says, as there was 100 years ago (not counting those in the United States).

Slave trading is carried on openly in most of the larger cities of Arabia and a slave market adjoins the Great Mosque of Mecca. Oddly enough, Liberia, which at one time was a refuge for escaped and liberated slaves of the United States, has nearly 800,000 slaves numbered among its 2,500,000 population. Slavery still exists in many parts of Ethiopia, many parts of China and northern Africa.

Keen Imagination Sure Check on Unkind Acts

A keen imagination is the surest check upon all unkind conduct. Happily, it is the very rare exception when anyone intends to be unkind. Most persons, however culpable, would indignantly deny the imputation. It is usually because they fail to realize the suffering they inflict; they are deficient in that power which depicts the pain of another to their own sensibilities.

There are many hearts now hard and callous that might be rendered tender and pitiful could their imaginative faculty be so developed as to make them conscious of the distress they carelessly produce.

RED CROSS REPORTS BUSY YEAR AIDING DISASTER VICTIMS

The American Red Cross assisted sufferers in more disasters throughout the United States during the year ending June 30, 1935, than through any similar period in the peace-time history of the organization, Admiral Cary T. Grayson, chairman, revealed, recently in commenting on the annual report which has just been released.

"The 128 domestic disasters in which the Red Cross extended aid during the fiscal year exceeded by 56 per cent the average over the past few years," Admiral Grayson said. "Not only was the period heavy in the number of disasters, but the geographical distribution was wide, with 37 States and 353 counties affected.

"Through these disasters and times of community distress, the Red Cross assisted 110,000 persons," the Admiral disclosed.

Spectacular service was rendered in many disasters because of the uniqueness of the problems and the far-flung points affected. The work of the National organization covered in the report carries stories of the Morro Castle burning; the trench-mouth epidemic in the beautiful San Luis Valley of Colorado; the great fight over a wide front in the mid-west dust bowl against respiratory diseases; floods, hurricanes, and tornadoes in many sections of the United States.

In addition to the disasters taking place within the continental limits of this country, Admiral Grayson pointed out that work had been made necessary by disasters in Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines, where 26 disasters were recorded in that archipelago. The American Society also assisted the Red Cross of two foreign countries in caring for victims of floods and earthquakes.

The variation of types of disasters called for expert council on matters relating to health and nutrition as well as epidimic prevention. Last year's work proved the value of the structure and administration of the Red Cross disaster relief, the Admiral said, the very frequency of occurrence and the variety of types constituting a severe test of the organization chartered by Congress to handle this type of National relief.

Expenditures of the Red Cross for relief of persons stricken by disasters within the continental United States amounted to $464,413. In addition, $75,000 was sent to the Philippines to assist them in three major relief operations necessitated by typhoons, $5,000 went to victims of the Indian earthquake, and $5,000 to Poland for victims of severe floods. A number of smaller foreign emergencies called for sums totaling $2,500.

The months of February, March, April, May and June were heaviest for tornado disasters. Floods occurred throughout the year. Serious fires calling for Red Cross assistance took place during July and December. A devastating explosion took place in Tennessee during April. Most of the hurricanes struck States along the east coast during the fall and early winter.

"All of this assistance to persons in distress," Admiral Grayson pointed out, "was only possible through generous contributions made by citizens in all sections of the country."

Most of this support of the disaster relief service comes from the annual Roll Call held each year from Armistice Day to Thanksgiving Day.

Restoring Mud Lake Means Return of Mosquitoes And Turning Prosperous Villages Into Ghost Towns

STATE OF MINNESOTA
E. V. Willard
Commissioner of Conservation
State Office Building
St. Paul, Minnesota

November 6th, 1935

Mr. George Fricker,
Chairman of Meeting,
Holt, Minnesota.

Dear Mr. Fricker:

I have for acknowledgment your letter of October 21st with attached resolution, passed at a meeting "called by all persons interested in this project" held October 16th, relating to condmenation proceedings in re: Mud Lake.

1. These resolutions coming to the department while condemnation proceedings for the taking of these lands are in court, can have no effect unless the department decides to move for dismissal of the project.

2. The Biological Survey approved of the Mud Lake area as a wild migratory fowl nesting and breeding grounds, as I recall it, in 1925. Investigations of the area have been carried on by the Survey from time to time and maps and reports were available long before the present proceedings were thought of. The area could not be acquired however, because of lack of funds. The project was revived about a year ago when federal funds were made available for the purchase of marginal and sub-marginal lands for migratory waterfowl refuges. The project has been given considerable publicity during this entire year. The last legislature passed a special law to enable the Department of Conservation to acquire the lands for the federal government. Conferences have been held in Washington, St. Paul and at Thief River Falls, and investigations have been carried on within the area the entire summer. It therefore seems strange that if indeed there is the kind of opposition to the acquisition of this area indicated in this resolution that such opposition was not indicated before this late date.

3. During the legislative session of 1933, representatives of Marshall County represented that the county was facing financial insolvency because of the inability of the county to meet its installments on drainage bonds due to tax delinquencies principally within the area east of Thief River. The legislature was told that these lands were worthless for agriculture; that they never should have been drained; that the drainage projects were the results of selfish promoters and that the state should repossess itself of these lands and manage them for conservation of water, forest and wild life. In response to this appeal an act was passed creating a "conservation area" of a portion of Marshall county. The entire tract proposed to be acquired thru the present pending proceedings is included within this conservation area. If you will read the act creating this area, drafted by representatives from Marshall County, you will discover that its enactment was justified on the grounds that the lands to be affected are sub-marginal in character; that they are intensively managed by the Department of Conservation for conservation purposes and that upon the payment by the state of delinquent drainage assessments that the state would get title to the lands. A map prepared by Marshall County and exhibited at the time this legislation was being considered, is attached hereto. The tracts in black show the lands which were tax delinquent at the time.

The present proceeding is the first attempt to give expression to the purposes outlined in the act. Either the representatives of Marshall County who appeared before the legislature in 1933 over-stated their case in order to get the state to take over the county's drainage bond indebtedness or else something must have transpired during the past two or three years to have added to this area the many attributes implied in your resolution.

4. Perhaps the department has made a mistake in asuming that this area, 90 percent or more tax delinquent and for all practical purposes abandoned, ought to be converted to some beneficial public use. If so, it is not too late to dismiss the proceedings. Your resolution would indicate that so far as those attending your meeting at least are concerned, they do not think much of what is being done. The Department has proceeded on the theory that it was aiding Marshall County and surrounding communities to get some funds for the taxing units as well as for the land owners themselves who still have equities in the land, and to provide an area for the propagation and protection of wild migratory fowl for the benefit of all of the people. If what your committee expressed is the wish of the majority of the people in Marshall County and the surrounding areas, the Department of Conservation will lose nothing but on the other hand be relieved of a large amount of work by dismissing the court proceedings at the present time. The department has however, not received any indication of organized opposition to the project except from the meeting above referred to.

Very truly yours,
E. V. WILLARD,
Commissioner of Conservation.

November 8, 1935

Hon. E. V. Willard,
Commissioner of Conservation,
State Office Building,
St. Paul, Minnesota.

Dear Sir:

Your letter to Mr. George Fricker, cashier of the Marshall County State Bank of Holt, in reply to the resolution, adopted at the mass meeting at Holt held on October 16th, protesting the "Mud Lake" project has been handed me for reply. I appreciate your frank discussion and exposition of the matter as it has been made to appear to you. Our people in this end of Marshall County are now having time after a busy summer to give fuller consideration to the whole force and effect of what has been going on, and as the drama unfolds they can see clearly what the intent is and the manner and extent of this exploitation. Now that we are thoroughly aroused we are going to speak right out and "let the chips fly where they will". Let me go back to 1911, trace the history of developments here, explain the causes and effects of the various influences and factors involved and why we reach our conclusions. This is a very serious matter to us here because it touches our homes, our health, our industry, our very hopes for our fair share in security and well being.

In the first place Thief River was dredged to improve the drainage of the valley which is a broad valley with no well defined margins and which has a marl soil that produced such a vegetation that it was overlaid with several feet of peat. The dredges could not dig through the marl hard-pan without using dynamite and this was not done. Into the improved river, but still not large, were constructed in 1910 or so "the largest drainage systems in the world" without providing adequate outlet for them during the wetter seasons. The whole country or valley had been more or less a floating bog on the lower area, a muskeg on the higher levels and gradually thinning out to the excellent mineral soils around Gatzke, Grygla, and on this side of the river around Holt and Middle River. Then followed a period of curing. The peat filter had to dry out, the peat had to be burned down or off entirely and old water-logged subsoil had to be aerated, sun-kissed and bacteria introduced. The settlers were poor as are most homesteaders. They had to build homes, roads, schools, pay heavy ditch assessments and taxes, meet current expenses of living and all on land going through a transition period that would take many years. Early frosts, the unbalanced soil, its loose texture, a flood one year that wiped out the crop in midsummer, several years of prairie and peat fires taking heavy toll of crops and buildings. Result: mortgages meaning a load of interest on top of the other burdens, ownership going to non-resident landlords. Then comes the agricultural depression starting in July, 1920 and persisting since that time. On the other hand the burning of the peat gained momentum and vast areas in that valley have been burned off and are now being farmed with amazing results.

Last year wonderful crops of barley and rye were raised on such burn-outs, 85 bu. of barley to the acre, for instance. Last fall saw a steady stream of trucks hauling out hay and gran and seeds from this area east of Middle River and Holt. Check it up here with the railroads, truckmen or anybody. Even this year 14,000 bu. of grain were marketed by the Dahl boys, east of Holt, in the area that you are told is abandoned and worthless except for ducks, geese, mosquitoes and deer flies. There are 53 patrons of the Holt Coop. Creamery who live in the area and who are the heavier patrons of course. I have been secretary of our creamery here since 1916 and I have seen our butter production rise from 60,000 lbs. to 350,000 lbs. per annum and our best producing area is east and south-east of Middle River. Check my records and I will gladly prove this to you. Why, give this country ten years more burning and packing by cattle and sheep and you would say we had a garden spot under the sun.

No doubt this area could be made again into a splendid migratory fowl nesting and breeding grounds; but you cannot do that without restoring unhealthy conditions, a pestilence of mosquitoes and deer flies that will make our lives pitiable and will damn our dairy industry, cut off some of our most fruitful territory producing grass seeds, hay, pasture, butterfat, wool cattle, sheep, and grain even. The judge and county board, in every case where these drainage systems were originally approved, truly judged that the public health and welfare required the drainage of this great area of marshy lands. That is still true unless our people and stock are to be driven away like Lot and his wife from Gomorah; so that the mighty hunters of the Isaac Walton League might visit the section in the fall when the insect pests have taken winter quarters.

No doubt the delinquent and current taxes can be collected in large measure from the awards and then there would be no further taxes from this area and the larger area that would suffer from the pestilence of mosquitos and deer flies. No doubt there are attorneys, engineers and contractors that will be rehabilitated by this proceeding as they were during the drainage proceedings. But the act states in the title that it is for the rehabilitation of the people in the area and most of these will leave without much more than a rebellious heart and a chance to get in relief lines or take on another load of interest. And this, Mr. Willard, is being done in the face of large importations of farm produce to bolster international trade and finance, development of vast irrigation projects in the west, hunger and semi-starvation among the impoverished of America. Where is the balanced production of the New Deal? Is there not plenty of wlderness left in America for wild life? Would the mighty hunters before the Lord who live at a safe distance from this area permit the restoration of the Beltrami swamp south of Crookston, the old swamp west of Argyle? There is a vast area east of Crookston that we can suggest ought to be returned to the buffalo, the deer, moose and elk, to provide big sport for big men. We will not stop them from having it if they wish; but we will not ask for it either. We believe that there is no security, no prosperity, no hope in such reactionary measures and it is hard to unscramble eggs.

Mr. F. A. Green of Stephen, representative from Marshall County, is the big shot who represents the interests of western Marshall County, not the interests of this part of the county. W. O. Braggans, who was county attorney, is the man who made some big money out of drainage proceedings here years ago, who assisted Mr. Green in getting the whole eastern end of the county over into your department's hands following the precedent established in the Beltrami, Lake of the Woods, Aitkin, Roseau and Mahnomen County cases, and I think the assumption of all these drainage bonds by the remainder of the county taxpayers was too heavy to be borne, is now being rehabilitated as an attorney in the restoration and condemnation proceeding and he is the man who got kicked out of his office as county attorney in the election last fall by an overwhelming majority vote. There are big shots at Crookston who are stalwart promoters of the wilderness in these parts too. At the conferences you mention, were any of them held up here where you could get first hand acquaintance with the Thief River Valley, were any of our business men or farmers invited to join in these discussions? I know of one man here at Middle River who is a busted banker, an inveterate hunter who guides the big shots over our country during the hunting season, who breeds and trains hunting dogs, who boasted this fall that he made $200.00 in one day hunting, who is the pal and accomplice of W. Rowe of Crookston in nailing this country down for a hunter's paradise and a farmer's hades. Perhaps he was consulted.

Mr. Fricer told me he did not know what would become of Holt with its territory maimed and a $30,000.00 bonded indebtedness on its school district. I know what Middle River is heading for and I am ever ready to pull stakes if this goes through. Talk to C. A. Engelstad, pioneer farmer and merchant of Gatzke and ask him what are his observations on what this project will do to this country. Talk to the business men of Grygla. Mr. Bush, the barber there, told me last Tuesday that the land was being condemned within six miles or so of that fine little village with its new creamery, etc., and how he knew what the prevailing summer winds from the west would blow into the Grygla territory. This area contributes a lot of business to Thief River Falls even and I am sure the hunting business will not contribute as much as a steady business from agriculture and dairying.

As to delinquency in taxes: I have explained the special conditions in that area that led to the specially heavy delinquency during the period of transition, depression, etc. To assess them so heavy for drainage systems with an inadequate outlet, to be paid during the curing period, was like asking a convalescent to pay a heavy doctor's and hospital bill during convalescence even though he be poor. To say that ten percent of the taxpayers could meet their obligations under such extremely trying times is to pay tribute to their good management, industry, perservance, special reserves and confidence in the final redemption of the valley. To seize upon these times, in view of the promised land, to put a whole generation's labor and expense into reverse, is apparently a ghastly waste, a destructive and unwise plan, a short-sighted catering to special privileged classes and a knock-out blow below the belt to our worthy commons.

Dynamite the bed of Thief River up a few miles to insure adequate drainage, let the burning go on and open up these areas again to actual farmers and the area will prove itself worthy of such redemption. No use going to Alaska to find good land. You are likely acting in the best of faith; but we believe you have been misled and should visit our towns and get the real low-down on this country. Go to our creameries, go to our elevators, to our business places and to our real farmers here, investigate relief rolls, etc. Then you will get a correct picture of present conditions and you too will dream other dreams.

Respectfully yours,
E. M. EVANS.

PUBLIC CONFIDENCE CONTINUES TO GAIN

Bankers Report Nation-Wide Improvement in Attitude Toward Banks—Educational Campaigns Play a Part

NEW YORK.—Ninety-six per cent of over 300 reporting clearinghouses throughout the United States find concrete evidence of favorable turns in public opinion regarding banks, it is shown in the results of a survey made by "Banking," the monthly publication of the American Bankers Association. City and country districts in every state are represented, it is pointed out.

"The outstanding conclusion is that there has been a genuine nation-wide improvement the last few months in the attitude of the public toward its banking institutions," the publication says. Statistical evidence on which the bankers base their conclusions which warrant this statement is as follows:

The Evidence

"How do bankers know there has been an improvement in the public attitude? They have certain statistical evidence. They have seen their deposits increase substantially in nearly all the cases reported, and tremendously in some cases. Many letters tell of increases of 100 to 300 per cent from the low point of the panic.

"For another thing, they know that fewer people are using safe deposit boxes as a repository for their savings, and that, in many instances at least, postal savings are declining.

"However, many express the view that they could throw out the statistical evidence and still realize that the public is in a better mood where the banks are concerned than before. The best evidence offered on this point, numerous bankers say, is to be found in the acceptance by the public of the newly instituted service charges and the reduced deposit interest rates."

A Summary of the Returns

"We find on breaking up the general classifications of replies to the poll that the 65 per cent of those answering with an unqualified 'yes' represent only a partial measure of the optimistic feeling. Adding the favorable replies included in other groups, (i. e. 'yes' with qualifications, 'no change,' and 'mixed') we find that the vote shows a definitely healthy situation in 84 per cent of the localities reporting; at least some signs of improvement in another 12 per cent; a continuance of unfavorable conditions in 2 per cent, and a change for the worse in another 2 per cent. It is not too much to say that this is substantially 96 per cent favorable."

Reasons for Changed Public Opinion

As to reasons for the changes in public opinion regarding banks reported by the clearinghouses "more than one organization has a word to say about the American Bankers Association advertising and educational material," the magazine says.

It mentions in addition the benefits of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation in the emergency, improvement in the general business situation, the weeding out of weak banks and the banking moratorium.

"The response to the survey can be put down as encouraging and informative," the magazine concludes. "It holds out the definite hope that with a continuance of a cooperative, educational attitude on the part of the bankers the rest of the journey back to normal may well be completed in the not too distant future."

The Weather

The weather the past week has been fine up to noon on Wednesday. On Monday and Tuesday it thawed all the time and the snow shrunk together. On Wednesday we had a blizzard with the temperature dropping.

Will Move Several Itasca Elk To Red Lake Preserve

Preliminary arrangements have been made by the Division of Game and Fsh to move twenty Itasca Park elk to the Red Lake Game Preserve. Elk have been practically extinct in this region since 1900.

A few years ago several head of elk were trucked up into the wilderness seventy miles northeast of here and set free to shift for themselves. Being raised in the state park, these elk were quite tame and fell an easy mark for outlaw hunters.

One party was caught killing these animals but, not until he had them all except one bull.

This party was, according to reports, dealt with according to law in such a case and, was as a matter of fact fined plenty for his cheap unsportmanlike trick.

Elk were plentiful here about forty years ago but, with no law to protect them, they had to go the way of the buffalo. We hope this new herd can roam around the refuge unmolested.

Safetygrams
BY
FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

Courtesy in driving will prevent many accidents. Courtesy includes many of the best rules of the road yet you will not find them embodied in the state vehicle laws. Here are some that every automobile driver should practice:

Take your turn in traffic. Do not pass several vehicles at a time and then crowd back into line wherever you happen to be.

Keep in line on wide pavements. Do not straddle two lanes and prevent people from passing on either side.

When someone signals that he wishes to pass, let him go by.

Do not park your vehicle so as to block entrances, access to parking spaces, or pedestrian walks.

Do not cheat at signals. Be generous enough to let the other vehicles and pedestrians clear the intersection.

Watch for puddles. Splashing pedestrians or other vehicles is more than rude.

Use a Want Ad. to find sellers when you want to buy.

Banded Ducks Data Shows Flight Habits

Data on 186 of a total of 1142 banded ducks has been obtained by the Game and Fish Division, according to a report received by Gustav Swanson, game and fish biologist. The returns come from 21 states and 3 Canadian provinces and reveal interesting facts as to migrations.

An aluminum band bearing the date and place is clipped on the bird's leg. Persons taking the banded birds are urged to report the place and date. In this way data as to the age and migratory habits of ducks is obtained.

In Minnesota ducks are banded in the spring and fall at the Thief Lake water fowl refuge in Marshall County. The work is carried on by the Division of Game and Fish in cooperation with the U. S. Biological Survey.

The report states that a pintail banded at Thief Lake in May 1934 was shot by an Indian at Churchill, Hudson's Bay in August, 1934. A pintail banded at the same time turned up at Long Beach, California, in the month of November, 1934.

A redbead banded in May, 1934, was shot at Currituck Sound, North Carolina, in January, 1935, which shows that in the case of redheads there is a rather definite east-west fly-way.

A redhead captured at Thief Lake, April 29, 1935, had been banded at Ithaca, New York, April 18, 1926. There are very few records showing longer life. The greatest age on record, according to Mr. Swanson, was the case of a pintail that was banded in 1914 and found twelve years later.

Fined For Purchasing Fish

During the month of October there were 295 arrests for game law violations and 176 seizures of game and equipment. Fines levied during the same period totalled $2,886.00.

Law violations reparted by the Division of Game and Fish last week included two fines of $99 each and costs for purchasing game fish from Indians. The law violators were given the choice of paying the fines and costs or being given 30 day jail sentences.

At Slayton a hunter was fined $100.00 and costs for taking more than the legal limit of pheasants. The birds were also confiscated.

The 4-H club carnival held at the Sunnyside school on Saturday evening drew only a small crowd due to too many other doings in the community. However, the small crowd that was there had a good time and the net proceeds were $20.00 according to reports sent to this offiice.

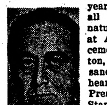
Armistice Day Celebrated Throughout Nation



President Roosevelt

ARMISTICE day was celebrated in the United States more generally and elaborately than it had been since the first of those occasions seventeen years ago. Chief of all the ceremonies, naturally, was that at Arlington National cemetery in Washington, where many thousands gathered to hear an address by President Roosevelt. Standing before the tomb of the Unknown Soldier, the Chief Executive paid a brief but eloquent tribute to the gallantry of America's fighting men in the World war, especially those who gave their lives in that conflict. Then, as the bugles sounded taps at 11 o'clock, he bared his head and stood silent for a minute, as did millions of his fellow citizens all over the land. The President next placed a wreath on the Unknown Soldier's tomb. For six hours, afterward, uniformed organizations marched up the hill in Arlington and laid their wreaths at the tomb.

The celebration in the national capital was culminated by a ball arranged by the Veterans of Foreign Wars. Congressional Medal of Honor men headed the list of guests, others being cabinet officers, diplomats and high officials of the army, navy and marine corps. Mrs. Woodrow Wilson was one of the guests.

Roosevelt Birthday Balls Will Be Repeated

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT will be fifty-four years old on January 30 next, and once more the day will be marked in many cities and towns by balls, the receipts from which will be devoted to the war on infant paralysis. Mr. Roosevelt announced his approval of the plan, which is fathered by Henry L. Doherty.

Doherty wrote to the President urging him to lend his name to a third series of birthday balls. He pointed out that the proceeds of the first ball enabled the Warm Springs Foundation in Georgia to carry on its program and the second financed and organized a major attack on the disease by research and provided funds for communities in which the balls were held.

Corn Husking Champion Sets World Record

NOT of vast importance, but interesting enough to command the presence of Secretary of Agriculture Wallace and 100,000 other persons, was the twelfth annual national corn husking contest held on a farm at the village of Newtown, Ind.

The winner was Elmer Carlsen, twenty-six years old, of Audubon county, who was competing against 17 opponents, the winners and runner-ups of nine midwestern states' contests. Carlsen shucked 41.52 bushels of the golden corn in 80 minutes, which means that he ripped the ears from the stalks, tore the flimsy husks from them and pitched a gross weight of 2,995 pounds into his wagon. He lost 88.43 pounds deducted for gleanings left in the field and husks left on the corn.

Carlsen set a new world's record, the old one being 36.9 bushels, which mark was beaten also by four others of the contestants. The first prize was a check for $100 given by the Prairie Farmer. Mr. Wallace said the contest was "the best I've ever seen."

Italian King Celebrates His 66th Birthday

King Victor Emmanuel

VICTOR EMMANUEL, king of Italy, celebrated his sixty-sixth birthday rather quietly because of the war in which his people are engaged in Africa. He reviewed a parade of armed forces, and with him was the real ruler of the country, Benito Mussolini. Il Duce then appeared on the balcony of his Venezia palace to address a great throng of cheering citizens in the plaza. He spoke just these two sentences:

"The forces you have seen this morning with all their weapons, and especially in their spirit, are ready to defend Italy's interests in Europe, Africa or anywhere.

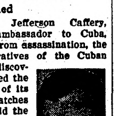
"In one month we have regulated two old accounts (apparently the Italian defeats at Aduwa and Makale, Ethiopia, in 1890) and the remainder will be settled later."

Mussolini that same evening sent to the nations participating in the sanctions against Italy a formal protest against their action, and warned them that Italy would be forced into reprisals with serious consequences to the economic world.

Meanwhile the Italian armies in Ethiopia were advancing steadily toward the interior from both the north and south. The strategic towns of Makale and Gorrahei were occupied practically without resistance. Harrar and Jijiga in the south and Dessye in the north were apparently the next major objectives. The Ethiopians, it was believed, would try to concentrate behind the invading columns to cut their communications.

Haile Selassie lost one of his ablest commanders in the death of General Afework, who was struck by an Italian bomb splinter during a bombardment of Gorrahei. He was educated in Europe and was skilled in military science.

Plot to Kill Ambassador Caffery Is Foiled



Jefferson Caffery

ONCE more Jefferson Caffery, American ambassador to Cuba, has been saved from assassination, the intelligence operatives of the Cuban army having discovered and thwarted the plot on the eve of its execution. Dispatches from Havana said the army officials believed the plot was nipped by the arrest of Cesar Villar, leader of the Confederation of Labor; that the assassination was to have taken place when Mr. Caffery left the embassy for home on November 1, and that six automobiles were ready to carry the assassins to a place of refuge. They believed the plot was inspired by radicals who seek to provoke American intervention in Cuba and hope this would bring on a revolution. It was said 29 men had been sworn to kill Mr. Caffery and certain others.

New Crisis in China Created by Japan

JAPAN'S apparent determination to dominate northern China has created another crisis in that oriental country, and Shanghai is involved for the Japanese have taken advantage of the slaying of a Japanese sailor there and landed a naval unit 2,000 strong which occupied the Hongkew section of the city.

As the Japanese force began patrolling with fixed bayonets and full war equipment, international settlement authorities mobilized a White Russian regiment of Cossacks under Col. F. R. W. Graham, British army officer detailed as commander of the local volunteer units. The Cossacks, paid by the international settlement, constitute a small standing army for the foreign quarter.

The Chinese were terrified and thousands of them fled from the native quarter to the international settlement, believing the Japanese intended military action in retribution for the murder of the sailor. This the Japanese government denied, but it declared the situation was "serious."

In Tokyo officials of the navy and foreign office met to discuss their policy, and it was reported that development plans for northern China were decided upon. Meanwhile Japanese military authorities at Tientsin invited to their headquarters Gen. Hsiao Chen-ying, chairman of the Chahar provincial government; Gen. Sung Che-yuan, head of the Peiping-Tientsin defense corps; Mayor Chin Teh-ching of Peiping, and Mayor Chen Ko of Tientsin to explain the army's new policy.

According to information from Japanese sources these Chinese leaders "have come to a strong determination that North China cannot exist unless it co-operates with Japan and Manchukuo by cutting away from Nanking."

Army Balloonists Soar to Record Height

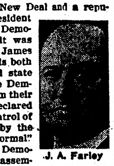
CAPTS. ALBERT W. STEVENS and Orvil A. Anderson of the army made their long delayed balloon voyage into the stratosphere, and if their barometric computations are sustained they reached the record altitude of 74,000 feet. Their balloon rose from near Rapid City, S. D., and landed safely near White Lake, S. D., eight hours and thirteen minutes later.

Steel Helmets Dissolved by Hitler's Order

BY ORDER of Reichsfuehrer Hitler, the Steel Helmet association of war veterans has been dissolved. This was highly satisfactory to the Hitlerites, who considered the association a rallying point for the conservatives. In a letter to Franz Seldte, founder and leader of the Steel Helmets, Hitler praised the veterans for "keeping alive traditions of the old army and striving for restoration of a strong reich," but said he deemed this goal achieved and the association no longer needed. Members will be admitted to the Nazi party if found acceptable.

Old conservatives are bitter over the abolition of the Steel Helmet organization. It is reported that the junkers (landed aristocracy), who at first co-operated with Hitler, are withdrawing to their estates. Farmers allege the junkers are not doing their utmost to help increase agricultural production.

Both Parties Find Cheer in State Elections



J. A. Farley

REPUBLICANS shouted loudly that the victory of their party in the New York state election was a terrific blow to the New Deal and a repudiation of President Roosevelt. The Democrats declared it was no such thing. James A. Farley, who is both national and state chairman of the Democrats, gave them their cue when he declared recapture of control of the legislature by the G. O. P. was "normal" and that the Democratic vote for assembly candidates taken as a whole exceeded the Republican vote by more than half a million, which was something of an exaggeration.

The Republicans gained nine additional seats in the assembly, giving them 82 to 68 held by the Democrats. Only two senate seats were involved in the contest, both to fill vacancies. One of them went to a Republican and the other to a Democrat, leaving the setup of the upper legislative body unchanged.

In 45 cities of the state, the Republicans elected 33 mayors, including Roland B. Marvin of Syracuse, possible nominee for governor next year. The President saw Hyde Park go Republican and Farley failed to hold his own district in Rockland county.

The Democratic organization in New York came through strongly and menaces the prospect of a re-election for Mayor LaGuardia, observers hold. The Fusion forces, which turned Tammany out two years ago, crumbled.

In Philadelphia S. Davis Wilson, Republican, was elected mayor but the vote was close enough for the Democrats to call it a virtual victory for the New Deal. Cleveland, Columbus and 23 out of 42 other cities and towns in Ohio chose Republican mayors, and so did a number of municipalities in Massachusetts. Connecticut Socialists re-elected Jasper McLevy mayor, and Democratic mayors were returned in Hartford and New Haven. Republicans gained control of the New Jersey legislature, but Hudson county, including Jersey City, went Democratic by a record vote.

Results in the spectacular election in Kentucky gave the New Dealers a real reason for rejoicing, for A. B. Chandler, known as "Happy," the Democratic candidate for governor who had the support of the national administration, handily defeated Judge King Swope, the Republican nominee. This despite the fact that Democratic Governor Lafoon had declared himself against Chandler and threw his support to Swope. The referendum on repeal of the state prohibition amendment gave the repealists a good majority.

In Virginia and Mississippi all the Democratic nominees were elected, which was to be expected.

George Accepts Offer of Greek Throne

THREE Greeks went to London to invite George II to return to the throne, in accordance with the plebescite of the Greek people. Deeply moved, he replied:

"I shall never forget the past. I shall return almost immediately to my beloved people. May we have divine guidance to bring happiness, peace, and prosperity to our Greece!"

Following the ceremony, the forty-five year-old monarch, with the Prince Paul and Peter and the Princesses Catherine and Olga, the latter a sister of the duchess of Kent, attended a special service of thanksgiving at the Greek orthodox church. Then the Greek king lunched with King George and Queen Mary of England at Buckingham palace.

Norris Wishes to Retire From the Senate

Senator Norris

GEORGE W. NORRIS, veteran Republican independent senator from Nebraska, has announced that he desires to retire from the senate. He is seventy-four years old, and has served 32 years, including ten in the lower house, and said: "I am no candidate. I am getting old. Younger men can and should carry on the work which I have tried to do during my years as senator."

His friends in Washington and Nebraska could not see any available fit man to succeed Norris, and expressed the belief that he could be persuaded to run again, either as a Republican, or as an independent if both parties in Nebraska nominate men whom he regards as stand-patters.

Senator Borah of Idaho, informed of Norris' announcement, said: "If I could do it, I would command him, for his country's sake, to change his mind."

Roosevelt Will Visit Chicago Dec. 9

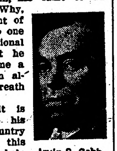
PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT has accepted an invitation from Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau federation, to appear before that organization in Chicago on December 9 and deliver an address. Mr. Roosevelt will arrive in Chicago at nine o'clock that morning, make his speech, and start back to Washington three hours later.

The President's promised trip to Indiana to take part in the dedication of a memorial to George Rogers Clark at Vincennes has been postponed until June of next year, when he will also visit the Texas centennial exposition in Dallas.

what Irvin S. Cobb thinks about:

Will Rogers' Memorial.

SANTA MONICA.—Where I sit writing this, I can see his home across the canyon. There's still sunlight on the top, but the folds in the friendly hills are turning purple.



Irvin S. Cobb

The most typical humorist since Mark Twain, the most beloved commoner since Abraham Lincoln, the most popular private citizen since Benjamin Franklin, his fame is an everlasting rock. Why, then, a monument of our fashioning to one who was a national institution whilst he lived, who became a national tradition almost before the breath left his body?

Nevertheless it is fitting that on his birthday this country should launch this memorial. For to help perpetuate the bright glory of that name is an obligation we owe to ourselves—a testimony of gratitude for a man amongst us who poured out so freely the precious gifts of sanity and sweetness, generosity and gallantry, a philosophy that was kindly, a wit that was salty but never was sour. You gave us so much, Bill, we're just figuring on paying a little something back on account.

• • •

Signs of Normalcy.

WE MUST be headed for normalcy. I'm back on somebody's sucker list. As a charter member of the original mother lodge, I belong there. I'm a boob Ben Adhem whose name led all the rest.

Today I received, not a list of selected foreign bonds—that'll come later—but a prospectus about a gorgeous gold mining proposition with all the regular by-products guaranteed, such as quicksilver, lead, copper, mothballs and, I think, amalgam fillings.

Sorry I can't invest in this new bonanza. But I'm saving up to go into an equally timely enterprise. It's a buggy-whip factory, and on the side we're going to turn out flintlock muskets for the United States army.

• • •

I'VE found out who the forgotten man is. It's any Republican officeholder above the grade of assistant state geologist who hasn't been proposed by self or friends for next year's Presidential nomination.

On every side, disinterested patroits feverishly suggest some deathless name that nobody outside the immediate family ever heard of and, lo, a national figure whose fame doesn't cover as much territory as a milk route is in the running. Almost anybody who can read and write appears to be eligible, especially if he lithographs well, and, if he has also the firm yet clinging handshake, his stock goes right up.

The concern is for a candidate only. When it comes to a platform, the Democrats can lend them one which has been used hardly any, if at all.

• • •

Return to Prohibition.

ALL else aside, some of us contend there were two main underlying reasons why this country went "dry" the way it did go. One reason was brewers. The other was distillers.

If a person of dubious repute opened a saloon in a neighborhood already over-provided, where, in order to live, he must break the liquor laws, there was, too often, a type of brewer ready to put up for the license and a type of distiller to help out with the rest.

Basically, it was the inarticulate resentment of orderly people against such practices which plunged us into the ghastly legislative error miscalled prohibition.

Now, with that mistake so nearly cured, one hears it directly charged that certain producers of alcoholic drinks are greedily back at the same old tricks.

Well, the next time the people of this country vote liquor out—and there'll be a next time, unless the sane men in the industry can curb the offenders within their own ranks—it'll be for keeps, no matter how deplorable the results in bootleggery and graft and crime and corruption.

You can tell a lunk-headed profiteer as far as you can see—but you can't tell him anything else.

• • •

Upholding the Constitution.

SO HEATED is the controversy over the imperiled Constitution that professional politicians are all agog, many going out of one severe gog right into another, accompanied by chills, fever and high blood pressure.

Everywhere you look, you see disputants, all lathered up with excitement, who wouldn't recognize that immortal document if they ran into it sitting in the middle of the big road, laying eggs.

I am offering a suitable prize—namely, Grimm's Fairy Tales in words of one syllable—to the first national committeeman, Democratic or Republican, who can tell offhand whether the Constitution starts off, "When in the course of human events," or, "Now is the time for all good men to come to the aid of the party."

Besides, I'd like to know myself.

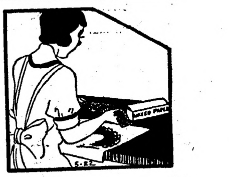
Housewife's Idea Box



To Store Laces

If you have laces which you do not intend to use for a long time, do not just lay them in a box or drawer until wanted. They are likely to be ruined by dry rot. To prevent this, wrap the laces in waxed paper. Then store them away in a box. They will keep very nicely in this way.

IT WORKED FOR ME

Women should take only liquid laxatives

MORE people could feel fine, be fit and regular, if they would only follow the rule of doctors and hospitals in relieving constipation.

Never take any laxative that is harsh in action. Or one, the dose of which can't be exactly measured. Doctors know the danger if this rule is violated. They use liquid laxatives, and keep reducing the dose until the bowels need no help at all.

Reduced dosage is the secret of aiding Nature in restoring regularity. You must use a little less laxative each time, and that's why it should be a liquid like Syrup Pepsin.

Ask your druggist for a bottle of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, and if it doesn't give you absolute relief, if it isn't a joy and comfort in the way it overcomes biliousness due to constipation, your money back.

Hal turned toward Barry then and, hands deep in jacket pockets, watched her in gloomy detachment. It was as if his mind were possessed by a local anesthetic, numb and useless around the small clear conduit that led from his eyes to the springs of superficial action. Where had love, or whatever it was, gone? When would the acid of this shabby lesson in beauty eat through, searching out each crevice in his spread wounds like iodine, to sting them deep? Tomorrow, after he had left her at some Los Angeles hotel, with Crack? Or tonight, soon, when he was out of this room.

She and Crack married—bound, linked, moving together across the country, hiding their connection till Hal should make himself vulnerable as an abandoned puppy. Later he might think of all the details of his opening himself to her, with Crack somewhere near by, drowsing over "shy" secreted schemes that amused him. He might think of the smallest things he had said as well as of the enormous things he had asked her to bring to him. And thinking of those, and remembering her dark, hard, unstirring acquiescence here there would be a richness of pain at which to clench his teeth, in which to learn how arrogance is cut down.

"There!" Crack exclaimed, darting from the bureau. "Tell me what you thinks that. Tell me if that starts changin' your mind."

Hal took the telegram and read idly. Under his father's name and office address the message ran: "Young man between twenty-five and thirty six feet hundred sixty-five pounds gray eyes brown hair gray flannel suit made by Selkirk in Oxford name Henry Ireland nickname Hal traveling from New York to Los Angeles in share expense auto stop claims he is your son account trouble which will explain after you wire Martin Crack at Grand hotel on Santa Monica boulevard Hollywood California if he is your son very important please reply quick—Martin Crack."

"Listen, Ireland," said Crack, his dry cheeks colored, his eyes shining and white all around the irises, "you're a good sorta guy. I'm only human." That's it, Hal told himself with quick satisfaction: he's not human, any more than a little puff-headed viper in the dust is human. "I'd like to save you the trouble this is gonna make for you if—"

"Oh, shut up," said Hal, wonderfully keeping his voice in superficial contempt. "If you've got to talk about it any more, talk to her." It hurt much more sharply than he'd expected—to say that so negligently; and his voice was dull as he added, "I'm going."

He walked past Crack to the door, opened it, and as he passed it from one hand to the other behind his back, he looked at Barry again. Still hugging her legs, her head still partly bowed, her staring went on, hard and dark and sullen, into the corner of the room. A jet of anguish sprang molten from his dead sense of her inviolability.

"And this is all," he said in a slow, moderate voice. "Everything led here—to this."

She turned her head slowly, not raising it, and looked at him, her scorn dull and general, only incidentally for him. Then her eyes went back to their staring before she said, her voice frankly husky, "This is all."

Crack followed him out the door, was following him down the hall outside as Hal heard the key turn the lock behind him. So she was ready to move as soon as they left. To do what? he wondered. Read, go to sleep, take up her staring again? As if it mattered!

"Listen," said Crack, a perverted intimacy struggling in his voice. "I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll—"

"You'll shut up," said Hal, and turned into his room, locking the door behind him lest he anticipate everything by throttling Crack's little life out of him there in the dark hall.

CHAPTER IX

Tuesday

When daylight began to heat the sky outside, Hal still lay awake and sweating on his bed, with only his coat off. He had meant not to doze, so that Crack, in the next room, shouldn't have a chance to send his telegram without Hal's knowing it.

He couldn't think of Barry except as he had last seen her—golden head a little bowed, staring over her satin knees into the corner. And though he kept putting the dark portrait from him, he found himself later regarding it again, intently, without knowing how it had come back, or why.

Then the light was broader over the wide street. He heard the creaking of Crack's bed next door, light steps, and then the running of water. Crack wouldn't send the telegram now before he found an open office somewhere. In Las Vegas probably, where—with luck—they would eat breakfast. With luck? What did so slight a thing as luck on the road matter? It didn't. But, yes, it did. There was Sister Anastasia and her serene, beautiful acceptance of sorrow. She counted most in this day, rather as if she had always counted most and Hal had not seen it for the glare and dazzle of his moonstroke.

Hal washed without refreshment and went down to unlock Rasputin.

He found the inside door to the deserted lunchroom open, so he bagged oranges for Mrs. Pulsipher, leaving a quarter in the dish where they'd been. And he sat on the running board eating one of them when Kerrigan came down, brown eyes bright in a combination of greeting and alertness for signs of news.

"Don't look as if you'd slept well," he said, his voice dubious in disappointment.

"Plenty," said Hal. "Wasn't as tired as I expected."

Hal watched him, tasting—still through that internal numbness—his rich affection for the quick, kind eye, the tough cheeks with their labyrinth of minute red veins, the straight lips with their implication of readiness and gusto. Then the Pulsiphers came out, not wholly awake but bustling in tandem already. Then came Crack, his bag in one hand, golf ball loose in the other; he pushed the ball nervously into his side pocket as he made his insecure good morning to Hal. And after him came Sister Anastasia and Barry. The cool peace of the nun's face was softly animated in the prospect of this last day between her and her brother, and Hal knew Barry hadn't told her anything. Barry, simply groomed as ever in her creaseless tailleur, gave him acknowledgment of nothing—nothing. The defensive mistrust of the journey's start was in her brief look; no suggestion of a smile framed her curt good morning; even Doc's lead was held short, as if to keep him from friendliness.

Rasputin put behind him the hundred and thirty-odd miles to Las Vegas in less than two hours and a half. The telegraph office was across and down the street from the place where they stopped to breakfast. Hal saw Crack's careless looking for it, saw him find it and stand for an indecisive moment before starting toward it. Hal drank orange juice and wolfed a bowl of cereal at the counter; it was natural enough he should pay his bill and saunter out to the street when Crack returned.

In the telephone booth next door, he called the telegraph office, and putting a shade of flat slowness in his voice, he had the girl accept him promptly as the person who'd just handed in a telegram for Frederick Ireland, in New York. Hal said: "I'd like to make it clearer in that part where it says he 'claims he is your son account trouble which will explain after you wire . . .' I want to say, 'Claims he is your son because asks credit for five hundred dollars to cover expenses including transportation to San Francisco stop.' After that it goes on the same: 'Wire Martin Crack, Grand Hotel' and what you've got there."

Hal went back with a certain small, grim elation to look at Rasputin's oil gauge. Poor old Pop; free, honest anger for a little while wouldn't hurt him much, wouldn't be new to him; and his prompt denial of parenthood would give Hal more time in Los Angeles.

When his numbed mind began to respond to old disciplines, it might try to tell him that the idea of his—Hal Ireland's—taking the soft throat of another human being in his hands and extinguishing the life that breathed there—that it was fantastic, preposterous. Could reason attack this certainty that he would be alone with Crack, that he would find him in a room composed of the several shabby rooms in this journey, and close the door carefully behind him, and lock it, and be alone with him? Once there, in the cool possession of his faculties, could reason find him an alternative to—to Would Crack, dead, still look old-fashioned and tidy, indolent and secret, sexless and immature, subtly and slyly hateful? If you beat a basking viper dead in the dust with a stick, it didn't look pitiable at all, surely.

Crack's silent presence behind did not oppress him; premonition was gone, gathered into the compactness of an item of memory. Now it was Crack who could be uneasy; it was Hal who had the secrets. He felt it secret to himself—his certainty that they would finally be alone; and it must stay secret, immune from a personal fury that could give Crack formless warning of danger. For if Crack vanished, slipped indolently away with the sly, drowsing triumph returned to his eye, Hal was obsessed for the rest of his life by the thought of that unbeaten evil, alive somewhere, gloating, hating him.

Would he see Barry after that? Would he look at her and remember things? Perhaps, but it couldn't get into his mind now.

They stopped at a lonely station to be sure of gas, oil, and water. Later, an unassuming fingerpost pointed the way to Death valley, off to the right. Hal heard the flat echo of the name in him and wished drearily for relief from these long, long stretches of the baking road. There must be an end to it; there must be an end, too, of this dull inability of his to see Barry except as she had sat on the bed the last night, staring, everything between them sullenly dismissed.

California welcomed them officially at its agricultural quarantine station, where the luggage had to come down off the roof and be opened for an inspector. Dropping the bags to Kerrigan and Crack, Hal didn't resist the temptation which the last two offered. "That—" he said to Crack in a voice casual enough, but plainly audible: "that's Kerrigan's, and that"—when Crack reached for it—"that's your wife's." He knew Barry wouldn't turn; but Sister Anastasia and Kerrigan both looked up at him as if he had cursed, and he had to drop his eyes to hide deep self-disgust.

A cool mist drifted up the Cajon Pass to meet them; and lower down the smooth concrete turnings they had a vista of the square-laid streets of San Bernardino, the low California bungalows, and the ranks of feathery eucalyptus. Hal didn't care why it seemed exciting to be so near the end—the end of a journey which once he had thought would be all tedium and then resolved should be careless holiday. After it was over he might begin to know what had happened to him, but there was nothing exciting about that.

In the middle of Mrs. Pulsipher's statistics on the thyroid Hollywood ladies took to keep their figures, John broke into frustrated sounds. He snapped his fingers in a moment and said, "It-tit-tit-tit said that way—that way. It-tit-tit—"

Hal half turned toward John with a feeling near absolute tenderness for him and said: "These darn signs seem to point in any direction for Los Angeles. What place is this, d'you know?"

"Pasadena," said Crack warily. "You can run out to Hollywood this way if you want." And he added, the insinuation of his voice unsure of its own slyness, "Whyn't you drop—us off there on the way?"

"Do that," said Hal briskly. It awed him a little to think again what might happen if Crack used that "us" when they were alone.

Guiding Rasputin to Crack's directions, Hal made a final attempt to fancy how it would be—to put Barry's bag down on the sidewalk and leave her there with her husband. Something might move and give him a remembrance other than the fixed image of last night. It might be the last time he saw her. Some little thing should happen, must happen, to show him where he was.

But it was nothing. Hal, on the roof, heard the good-bys said below him and saw Barry go a little apart with Sister Anastasia, write something on a slip of paper and give it to the nun before she kissed her. Her blue eyes came slowly to his, the hostile, unremembering screens fixed against him. Perhaps she watched an instant longer than suited her negligence, but that was all. He knew she wouldn't speak; and he looked away first, bending over to take Doc's muzzle in his hand and shake it gently. "Bye, poodle," he said. And then he was watching the ingenuous, unsurprising grace of her boy's stride take her away, beside the terrier's bright trotting.

And this might be the last he ever saw of her! Good G—d, why did that still mean nothing?

• • • • • • •

The room was nondescript and comfortable and Kerrigan, in shirt-sleeves by the window, swept his paper down when Hal came in, smiled a faintly disturbed welcome, and said, "Well, here we are. When d'you shove off for Santa Barbara?"

"In a while," said Hal. "She's seeing a priest who knows her brother—what's on his mind, how he is and all. You knew her brother was dying? He is. That's why she's in a rush, bless her good heart. She's going to call up when she's ready. When do you have to be on the job, Colonel?" he asked.

"The End of the Trail?" he said, his eyes barely livened for a moment. "No hurry. Any time this month."

Hal watched him consider an opening for what he had to say and carelessly thought to head it off with: "Colonel, if you got the chance to round out your collection of experience, how would you do your man in? Knife, I mean? Or gun? What?"

"Would depend," Kerrigan said cautiously. "Why?"

"Interest," said Hal. "Interest." A bad poke; try something else, quick.

POULTRY

OVERCROWDING IS BAD FOR POULTRY

Laying Birds Need Vitality to Produce Eggs.

By Roy S. Dearstyne, Extension Poultry Specialist, North Carolina State College. WNU Service.

Overcrowding the laying birds in winter robs them of their vitality and makes them susceptible to disease. Birds should be given adequate housing facilities, with plenty of ventilation, but no drafts. The colds and roup from which many flocks suffer may be traced to inadequate ventilation.

As cold weather arrives it is advisable to check the birds again for parasites, both internal and external. Infected birds should be treated at once.

Birds to be used for breeding purposes should be blood tested for pullorum disease.

It is important to keep accurate records on the flock. Records are essential to the development of a profitable poultry business.

Records help poultrymen ascertain which birds are good producers and which are falling down on the job. They show the cost of operation, and whether the poultryman is making a profit. They help him find weak spots in his system of management.

Body Weight Important; Keeping Tab Suggested

Did your hens ever go into a neck moult and stop laying during the winter right at the time when eggs are highest? Most poultrymen have had this experience and it is usually due to loss in body weight. So it is important that body weight be maintained and a good way to keep tab on it, says a writer in the Missouri Farmer, is to paint a spot on a number of hens, say ten out of every hundred or so, and weigh them frequently. While their weight can be averaged to determine the gain or loss in weight, a good way to do it is to band each hen with a numbered band and keep a record of their respective weights tacked up on the wall of the laying house. If they are losing weight, increase their grain ration if they have not had access to it continually, and if they have, feed them a daily feed of wet, crumbly mash. A feed of succulent greens each day will also stimulate their appetites and cause them to put on weight.

A fat hen is always preferable to a thin one but sometimes, especially with the heavier breeds such as the Rocks and Reds, hens become too fat and one will occasionally fall dead off the roosts at night. When the body weight rises above normal, the grain feed should be cut down.

Care of Pullets

Housing pullets early and being sure that they are comfortable are two of the main requirements for success in winter egg production, says Miss Cora Cooke, extension poultry specialist, University farm, St. Paul. This means having the poultry house ready early and having it properly insulated, ventilated and equipped. The essentials in housing are that the house be dry, warm, light, sanitary, and of the right size. After all, these requirements are simple and not necessarily expensive. Many houses that are now very unsatisfactory could be fixed up at practically no cash outlay. New temporary quarters may even be made from baled straw.

Greatest Poultry Farm

Australia claims the greatest poultry farm in the world, that of James and Walter Carter, at Werribee in Victoria. In the season, 240,000 chickens are hatched, and 65,000 eggs are produced daily. Five tons of meat are eaten each day, and other food comprises corn, milk, wheat, bran and pollard. Eighteen acres are under sheds and the wheat silo takes 15,000 bags. The farm sells its eggs for eight months on the local market, and exports for four months in England. Legislation is contemplated in the state of Victoria to provide for organized marketing of primary products, including eggs.

Different Kinds of Lice

There are several different kinds of lice that attack chickens and the method of control is about the same for all of them, says a writer in the Indiana Farmer's Guide. A streak of nicotine sulphate the width of a pencil lead spread on the perches about half an hour before the birds go to roost, followed by a second treatment ten days later will control the lice. If whitewash has been applied to the roosts it should be removed before the nicotine sulphate is used.

Scratch Feed in Litter

Scratch feed in litter is unsanitary and dangerous to the flock from a health standpoint, says the North Carolina State college. The litter in the poultry house, as a general rule, is not changed as often as necessary and thus becomes soiled with the droppings. As this mixture of litter and droppings increase the danger from many poultry diseases also increase. Worm eggs and other internal parasites are picked up with the scratch feed together with disease germs.

Omens for Luck Are Still Guide

Superstition Rules Many Activities, Especially in England.

Old superstitions remain and new ones are added. When winners in the Irish Sweep were asked to say to what they attribute their good luck, a heavy percentage replied that they had a "lucky number" to thank. (The number 13 was considered both lucky and unlucky.)

Others attributed their good fortune to spiders, "money spiders" particularly, and one individual believed he won because he had carried a piece of coal about with him since the dawn of 1933. One gave the credit to a fall of oak leaves upon him, and another wrote: "Last year was the first time that swallows built on my property, and my wife said immediately, 'Oh, don't disturb them, swallows bring good luck.'"

In England superstition is not confined to the countryside; it is to be found even in the center of business London. No member of the Rothschild family, for instance, will shake hands with a customer in his own bank or place of business. The Rothschilds consider it unlucky to do so.

Again, London's Bush house has eight of its pillars ornamented and one plain. The idea, derived from the ancient Greeks, is that God alone can achieve perfection and that man therefore could not attempt it.

Practically every member of the London Stock exchange carries a mascot. One especially favored is a crooked coin, a sixpence for choice. But for the crooked coin to bring luck it must have been given to you. You must not have received it in change.

For the last 70 years, a well-known diamond merchant asserts, the fortunes of his firm have been influenced by a large and beautiful sapphire. This merchant is K. D. Parikh of Antwerp and Bombay, and the sapphire, which came from the Kashmir mines, was bought by his grandfather 40 years ago.

The gem is named "Shani," which means "Luck Bringer." It is kept in a special safe, on New Year's day. Once it was sold and immediately misfortunes befell the firm. It was bought back, and all went well.

"Shani," which originally cost $10,000, has gained so remarkable a reputation that $60,000 was offered for it not long ago. The offer was rejected.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

2,150 Pounds Amount of Food You Eat Per Year

You will eat a ton of food this year—2,150 pounds, the statisticians say. Milk, fluid and canned, and other dairy products, will account for half of this. (Milk is heavy.) You will eat about 150 pounds of meat, and about the same amount of fresh fruit; 150 pounds of fresh vegetables, not counting 150 pounds of potatoes.

In bread and cakes and breakfast foods and macaroni, you will consume 230 pounds of flour and cereals. Sugar, 102 pounds of it, is the next most important item. Of canned fruits and vegetables, you will eat 38 pounds, states Today.

LONGEST FIRE-BREAK

The Ponderosa Way, said to be the longest fire-break in the world, is nearing completion, J. H. Price, writing in American Forests, reported recently. It extends lengthwise through a major part of California, from the Pitt river in the north to the Kern river in the south, a distance of 650 miles. It varies in width from 50 to 200 feet, and follows the lower edge of the Ponderosa pine-belt, protecting the pines from fires starting in the foothills below.

Self-Help Leaders Going to College

New Institution to Provide Proper Training.

Santa Barbara, Calif.—A new college to train leaders for the self-help co-operative movement has been established here.

As their laboratory and clinic, the students are working in the Santa Barbara county co-operative industries, a local co-operative which has more than 1,000 members and is rapidly developing into a model project of its kind.

Director of the new college is Dr. Ralph Scanlan, for the last several years professor of social science at Santa Barbara State college. A committee headed by Dr. Rexwold Brown, head of the Santa Barbara clinic and a member of President Roosevelt's committee on economic security, is completing the organization of the college.

Calls Need Paramount.

"The need for properly trained leaders for the self-help co-operative movement," said Doctor Scanlan, "has become increasingly apparent to all who have watched the movement and who regard it as the most promising development in a welter of relief activities to solve the knotty problem of the economic rehabilitation of our unemployed.

"Hundreds of self-help co-operatives have been started throughout the country during the last few years. Many have failed, after a burst of enthusiastic growth. According to a federal survey, the collapse in a great majority of cases was due to a lack of competent leadership.

"Land and equipment are essential in the productive activities of the co-operatives, to mix with the labor and skill of their members, but equally important are leaders who can show people how to work together to earn their own living and thus get off of the relief rolls.

"It is the purpose of the new college to train these needed leaders, teach them the technique of co-operative enterprise, build up their cultural backgrounds in the applied arts and the applied sciences of well-being, give them a rounded practical experience in the model local co-operative and send them out into the state and nation to assist in the rehabilitation of the unemployed."

Get Actual Experience.

Students spend their afternoons working in the various sections of the co-operative on a revolving plan to gain a varied experience. They also attend round-table meetings of the planning committee, held Monday, Tuesday and Friday evenings, as well as the Saturday afternoon meeting of the government board.

Class work occupies the morning. There is a course in the technique of co-operation and the management of co-operative enterprises, under the direction of Hjalmar Rutzebeck, director of the Santa Barbara county co-operative industries and formerly of the division of self-help co-operatives of the federal government.

Danish Farmer Solves Case of Lost Chickens

Copenhagen.—A sheep which prefers chicken to grass was found by a Danish farmer near Hjoerring. The farmer had noticed that his chickens were disappearing one by one, and after a careful watch came to the conclusion that the one sheep he had on the farm was the thief. To prove his theory, he drove some hens with their chickens toward the sheep. The sheep waited until a chicken was within striking distance and then seized it in its mouth, eating the bird up with evident relish.

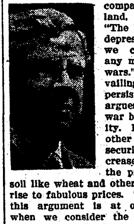
CAN WE AFFORD ANOTHER WAR?

By
LEONARD A. BARRETT



In his book, "The Economics of Recovery," Mr. Leonard Ayres of the Cleveland Trust company at Cleveland, Ohio, writes: "The lesson of this depression is that we cannot afford any more great wars." True. A prevailing and rather persistent notion argues today that war brings prosperity. If we had another great war, all securities would increase in value and the produce of the soil like wheat and other grains would rise to fabulous prices. The fallacy of this argument is at once apparent when we consider the fact that the aftermath of the last great war was the depression through which we have been passing. In this same book Mr. Ayres writes, "The depression is one of the major consequences of the war."

The total cost of the last great war was upwards of two hundred billion dollars, shared by all the nations involved. An indebtedness so staggering as to leave ruin in its path; bankruptcies, wrecked fortunes, unbalanced budgets and economic failures. Yet in spite of this clearly defined evidence, some persons still insist that war brings prosperity.

Let us remain sufficiently sober in our judgment to ask, can we afford another depression? Surely we cannot. Then we cannot afford another war.

The economic consideration, however, is not the most serious aspect of the case. The loss of the man power of our country distinctly forbids another war. Ruined homes and broken hearts with a corresponding loss of "morale," even in spite of organized efforts of relief, do not argue for prosperity or for national security. One of the most important views, expressed by some men in high places of responsibility, is their apologetic attitude for having persuaded others to a favorable aspect of the last great war. In some of their published addresses they frankly apologize to the "dead soldier" whose life was sacrificed on the battlefield of the last war.

Since the recent war has left nothing but ruin in its trail, we are asking in all seriousness, just how safe is our western civilization when the modern weapons of warfare have supplanted the gun and sword with air raids, poisoned gas and diseased germs. We frankly admit we cannot afford another war if we want to preserve what is left of the culture of our civilization and save for posterity the soul of America.

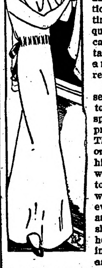
The Household

By Lydia Le Baron Walker

AUTUMN is one of the seasons when colds flourish. Many of these can be eliminated by attention to little things. So it is wise to take precautions. Colds, if light, are merely annoying but when severe may result in weeks of illness, sometimes accompanied with danger, and again resulting in a prolonged term of feeling misearable and run down, minus any danger element. Whether the cold is severe or not it is contagious or infectious enough for an entire family to get it, one after another, or at practically the same time and not in sequences. Great precaution has to be taken to avoid this annoying occurrence.



The change of season is reputed to be largely responsible for the prevalence of colds. This means that one should be on his guard to suit warmth of clothing to hot and cool weather. Also, as even a temperature as can be kept, should prevail in houses. Avoid having rooms too hot, as well as allowing them to be too cold. A medium heat during the days when there is sunshine to temper the atmosphere and an increase of it when the sun goes down and the evenings get chilly. Extra heat in the early morning is necessary also. The adapting of indoors heat to outside conditions helps to ward off colds.

Outdoor and Indoor Life.

One of the dangers of taking cold is found in the change from a life in the open during vacations, and the confinement within four walls when work is resumed in the autumn. The body has become inured to the exigencies of outdoor elements. It has to readjust to indoor conditions. Therefore when it is possible, keep out of doors. It is one safeguard. Sleeping warm, and protected and having windows open to admit the pure outer air is another precaution.

And whether indoors or out seeing that the body is kept sufficiently warm, neither over protected and uncomfortably hot, nor without sufficient protection and liable to get chilled. With adults this should be their own concern, but with children mothers have the responsibility, and they have to keep an eye on the youngsters when playing lest they discard outer garments when they get hot instead of cooling off less suddenly.

As for guarding against taking colds from one another in a family, one way is for the person with the cold to sleep alone, not even in the same room with others. Another is the careful use of handkerchiefs to prevent them getting in the hands of those free from colds. A person should always sneeze into a handkerchief, lest germs escape into the air. The use of paper handkerchiefs which are burned after using is an excellent idea.

The Way to Happiness.

Satisfaction in life is seldom felt when a person is continually idling away time. Restlessness seizes such an individual. This is the urge to do something which will be of genuine worth. Those who are inclined to envy persons who, because of sufficient incomes, have leisure to do whatever they choose with their time, do well to consider this side of the matter. To follow the line of work one has chosen is really a privilege. To be employed in some worthwhile business is a satisfaction. To be of use to those one loves is a blessing.

Even when jobs are not entirely congenial, a person has the compensation of realizing he or she is a self-supporting individual, and this is gratifying. Or it may be that the person is not only doing this, but is contributing to the needs or the comfort, or both, of one or more other persons. Could idleness bring any such satisfaction?

The zest of recreation is lacking unless the pleasure is in contrast to every day experiences. When a person is being diverted by continual "good times," there has to be great diversity and after a time the rounds of pleasure pall. Dissatisfaction with life comes, and one is in a vortex of conflicting ideas. The wish to be continually amused is at war with the desire to do something real.

Happiness is an elusive elf, and is not to be cajoled. He flirts with pleasure but abides with contentment.

Father by Proxy

By SCOTT W. RYALL

WNU Service.

He lifted the telephone from its hook in the call box intending to report the incident when his free ear caught the faint shout:

"Help!"

He whirled as the desk sergeant answered his call, saw a distant form huddled on the sidewalk, and slapping up the instrument hurried as fast as his weight allowed.

He saw a woman there. Her face, pretty and glowing palely in the night light, was raised in pain. She was trying to speak and he bent toward the whispering lips.

"Holy Michael!" he exclaimed, and forthwith butted in the door of a closed store before which she lay, and carried her in.

The desk sergeant sent around one of the night patrol cars after Casey's sudden breaking of the connection with the Grimm street post. They found Casey in his trousers and underwear, recalling a slim book knowledge about his work. He was wrapping a pinkish, new-born baby in his shirt and coat, leaping from child to mother on the floor and yelling enough to burst a lung, for some help.

The captain sent a relief man to Casey's post and he went to the hospital with mother and baby in the ambulance the policeman had called.

And there was the strange spectacle of big, genial Jim Casey, himself a bachelor, nervously striding over the cold marble of the waiting room floor while white-clad doctors ministered to mother and child.

He wore an old overcoat one of his brother officers had pulled from the back of the car. A doctor came into the room. He was smiling in the friendly, amused manner of speaking to a man who has just endured the strain of becoming a father.

"Congratulations, sir. It's a boy."

Casey looked at him curiously, then laughed aloud. "I'm the cop on the beat, Doc, and this was an emergency," he explained. He held back the coat to show little more of a uniform than police suspenders.

"Oh, sorry. If that's the case, please give us a report, Officer. I had an idea that you were the father."

"Foster father," suggested Casey, grinning. "Sure, I'll give 'em a report and tell the little lady—well, just mention I'm glad it was a boy." Then Casey filled some forms and went out.

He expanded his chest and turning into Grimm street came upon a thin little man hurrying in the manner of Ninth warders when they do not see a policeman but likewise do not want to.

Casey dismissed baby and mother from his mind as he recognized the figure. It was the shadow in Ginsburg's alley.

He reached out a big hand as the other came close. "Wait a minute, son," he said, "let's talk a while."

There was an instant look of fright which seemed somewhat lessened on seeing Casey's informal dress.

"Sorry, sir," he replied hastily, "I'm really in a great rush."

"Maybe," said Casey, not missing the significance of the other's start, "but I'm really a policeman."

"Oh!" It was a gasp, almost a moan.

That was enough for Casey. He tightened his grip on the other's collar and led him up the street. "Y'know," he said, "it's still considered a crime to break into other people's places."

"But I didn't steal a thing, officer. I swear I didn't."

"You were going to," retorted Casey.

They had reached the Grimm street call box and Casey opened the door with one of the keys he drew from his pocket. The man turned under his grasp and looked at him with pleading eyes.

"Please," he begged hoarsely, "don't call the wagon. Come with me. Keep hold of my collar but don't call them until I find my wife."

Casey held his hand from the instrument. Suddenly the mother and baby popped back into his mind.

"I gotta find her," pleaded his prisoner, "she's little, with a pale face and dark eyes, dressed in blue—"

"With white dots," said Casey softly.

"Where is she? Where is she?" he cried.

Casey looked sternly at him. "Son, what did you get out of Ginsburg's grocery?"

"Nothing! Nothing! Where is my wife, you—"

"You admit you broke in?" questioned Casey relentlessly.

"Oh, I'll admit anything. I never stole a thing in my life but she had to eat and I've gotta find her. Man, she's going to have a baby!"

The big officer closed and locked the box. "Son," he said calmly, "it's a boy and she's all right and being well taken care of in the General hospital, but I want to tell you—"

He never finished the sentence for his recent prisoner was already racing down the street and Casey grinned broadly.

"Jim's always a good name for a kid," he said thoughtfully and hopefully in the direction of the most unemotional of police call boxes.

Policemen are like that, even bachelors.

Do You Ever Wonder

Ask Your Doctor and Find Out

Don't Entrust Your Own or Your Family's Well-Being to Unknown Preparations

THE person to ask whether the preparation you or your family are taking for the relief of headaches is SAFE to use regularly is your family doctor. Ask him particularly about Genuine BAYER ASPIRIN.

He will tell you that before the discovery of Bayer Aspirin most "pain" remedies were advised against by physicians as bad for the stomach and, often, for the heart. Which is food for thought if you seek quick, safe relief.

Scientists rate Bayer Aspirin among the fastest methods yet discovered for the relief of headaches and the pains of rheumatism, neuritis and neuralgia. And the experience of millions of users has proved it safe for the average person to use regularly. In your own interest remember this.

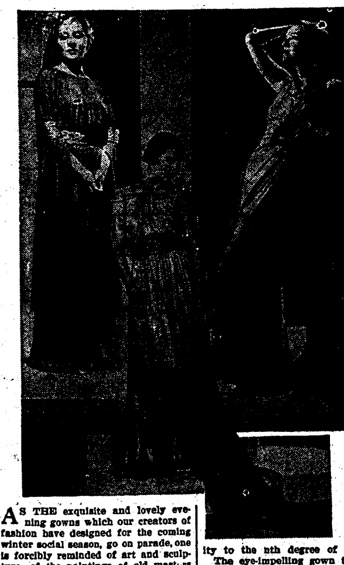
Evening Silhouette Goes Classic

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



AS THE exquisite and lovely evening gowns which our creators of fashion have designed for the coming winter social season, go on parade, one is forcibly reminded of art and sculpture, of the paintings of old masters or of figures in classic drapes and pleats sculptured in marble or colorfully frescoing ancient palaces and cathedrals of ancient Rome.

It is in these new fashions for formal occasion which are to grace opera and ballroom and smart functions galore, as if Italian saints were descending from old-master paintings, in flowing robes of rich velvets that are girdled and jeweled in dazzling splendor. Then again it would seem as if Greek goddesses were stepping down from their marble pedestals in garments that are draped and pleated along sculpturesque lines of grace and beauty. And again oriental princesses clad in harem-skirted costumes with softly draped and richly be-jeweled blouses seem to have come to life in array of gorgeous splendor. Verily "art in dress" holds sway this season.

The soft crepes, the supple superb velvets, the tissue-like, glamorous gold and silver cloths, the diaphanous chiffons and dainty silk sheers, all lend themselves beguilingly to the present movement in costume design which calls for floating scarfs, huge wing sleeves, and fluttering side pleatings that go all the way around the skirt or are captured in cascades of exceeding grace.

At all times in these classic gowns the feeling of simplicity is maintained, even though a resplendent note be sounded in richly jeweled girdles or golden sandals or sumptuous costume jewelry. See the group of evening gowns that are herewith illustrated and be convinced that the very loveliest after-dark fashions are playing up sophisticated yet classic simplicity to the nth degree of perfection.

The eye-impelling gown to the left which so unmistakably bespeaks inspiration of the Italian rennaissance is a Jeanne Lanvin creation. This glamorous robe is of magenta crepe, its rich beautiful tone matching up to the dark vibrant coloring in old master paintings. It is full, falling in generous folds starting from massed shirrings. The wide girdle and armlets are of cutout gold kid. The rich magenta coloring of this dress speaks eloquently of the present color trend, which stresses the rarely beautiful dark reds and purples and green that have come down to us through the ages via Italian art.

Hammered silver cloth fashions the adorable gown centered in the group. The glittering fabric falls with exquisite grace from the gathered waistline and is draped in a harem hemline. The wide belt worked in multi-colored jewels is a climaxing touch of artistry. Silver sandals are worn. The graceful wrap which this silver-gowned lady has in her hand is of royal blue velvet. It is fashioned with a surplice that ties at the back.

Style notes which tune in to the classic trend tell of low-heeled Grecian sandals such as the smart Parisienne takes delight in wearing. The sari scarf is another item of interest. It is of tissue metal-shot weaves and sometimes it is richly embroidered with sparkling sequins.

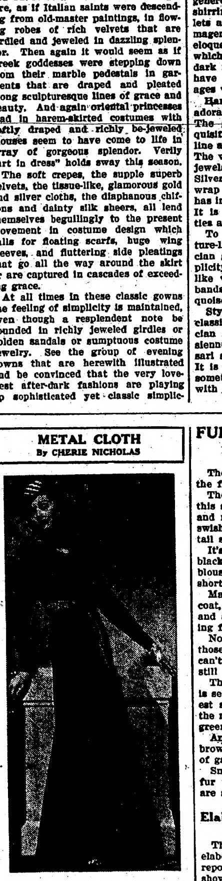
METAL CLOTH

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



Glittering silk lame makes this long-sleeved dinner gown. It is typical of the trend toward elegant fabric that is fashioned with utmost simplicity. The influence of the Far East is traced in the tall turban also fashioned of silk lame and the long-streamered sash in a vivid hue, that falls in a cluster of fine side pleats to the hemline of the skirt. Note the new low-heeled sandals.

FUR BLOUSE IS NEW WRINKLE IN STYLE

The fur blouse is a new wrinkle in the fashion picture.

They've used fur for everything else this season, from coat sleeves to hats, and now the fur blouse emerges as a swish accessory for the velvet cocktail suit.

It's done in white galyak, with a black velvet ascot and belt. The blouse is a brief peplum style, with short sleeves and a yoke.

Nothing could be more effective for those in-between occasions when you can't wear formal evening clothes, but still want a slightly dressy costume.

The fur vest, of black galyak, also is seen with some of the season's newest suits. It's effective with suits in the new renaissance tones of wine and green, with matching black accessories.

And if you want to do the thing up brown, you may have a matching muff of galyak.

Small fur ascots, styled to match the fur turbans and muffs of the season, are seen about town.

Elaborate Trimmings Now Feature Shoes for Evening

The trend in evening shoes is toward elaborate effects, according to a recent report from Paris. They not only show original shapes and graceful straps, inspired by Greek sandals, but are made of unusual materials.

Velvets Hold Sway

May Yet Probe That Ohio State Football Affair

IN SPITE of soft pedaling by those Big Ten officials who became so indignant at Iowa several years ago, alumni are demanding that there be some investigation of that noisome Ohio State university football mess. Ticket scalpers who did such a tidy trade in ducats for the Notre Dame game at Columbus need not be alarmed though. Ohio's unemployment program hardly will permit any tinkering with business before December . . . Incidentally, there seems to be no truth to the rumor that if a few more players can be added to the state pay roll L. W. St. John, the Ohio State university athletic director, will run for governor.

One reason, perhaps the big reason, why Paulino Uzcudun is anxious to offer his chin for the greater glory of Joe Louis may be the fate that befell the San Sebastian casino in Spain. After, it is charged, $275,000 had been paid for protection of the gambling privileges the place opened only to be put out of business by Spanish officials 24 hours later. Uzcudun, and this will be hard for those who know what love he bestows upon each nickel to believe, is said to be the guy who sacrificed the $275,000 . . . Ike Kern, Colgate's triple-threat back, tossed 10 passes for touchdowns last fall and has been on the passing end of many scores this year . . . Bill O'Brien, the tennis promoter, who will conduct a Class B baseball team next year, is looking for a big-name manager.

Uzcudun.

Is Walter Okeson Headed for Gate?

Do those leading football officials really mean it when they talk about refusing to handle games next year if Walter Okeson, present dictator of assignments, is kept on the job? . . . Big George Corrigan plans to visit Ireland in search of a new White Hope . . . Mary Hirsch, the first woman trainer ever granted a license by the New York Jockey club, did not saddle a horse on the metropolitan wheel during the season. Her only horse, Captain Argo, was taken to Narragansett, where he was lost in the claiming box . . . Siggy Wortmann and Ernie Schwarcz nominate Henry Hunter, former coach of the Hakoah S. C. of Vienna and now coach of the Hatikvoh All-Star Jewish eleven, as the best soccer tutor in the business . . . When a horse is disqualified at Tanforan he is placed in back of the horse with whom he interfered.

Although racing has been highly profitable for New England track promoters this year, the Narragansett pari-mutuel clerks had to take a $2 daily cut . . . Earl Moore, who is twenty-one years old and who has been totally blind since he was eight, is a 135-pound wrestler at Upsala college. He also won his letter in the sport while a member of the Overbrook school team . . . Chick Wergeles, second assistant press agent for the pro football Giants, has been on the job 11 years. Although ordinarily somewhat of a big betting man, he waited until the Bears' game to make his first wager on them—and lost . . . Captain Bill Shuler, Irish O'Connor and Alphie King of the Army varsity eleven are honor students. But 51 members of the original Plebe squad of 80 have been dropped for scholastic deficiencies . . . Because no really first-class rider has been developed since stall gates came into use, horsemen are insisting that these starting devices be abolished.

What eminent group of sportsmen shiver every time the income tax is mentioned? . . . John Reed Kilpatrick, who now operates Madison Square Garden in conjunction with the William Randolph Hearst Athletic club, continues an amateur at heart. Although other members of the prettily named "amateur hockey" league wished to cut loose from the A. A. U., the Garden will continue to share the gravy from its all-for-glory team this winter . . . This team, not to be confused with the Rangers, who, of course, get paid for their work, is the Rovers . . . Tony Canzoneri and Jimmy Braddock receive bigger ovations than any other fighters when they visit small local clubs.

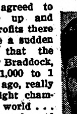
Gil Dobie again is having alumni trouble at Cornell . . . Western folks are insisting that Bob Quinn, business manager of the Brooklyn baseball club, will succeed Tom Hickey as president of the American Association . . . In addition to being manager of the Crescent-Hamilton soccer team, Joseph J. Barriskill also is president of the United States Football (soccer) association.

CERTAIN celebrated horsemen have discovered a new way to beat the saliva tests. Immediately after a horse has been hopped they apply a brand of mouthwash which eliminates the customary trace of dope . . . Tony Galento, the most boisterous belter among the heavyweights, gobbles from 15 to 20 hot dogs after each fight . . . Philadelphia fans who have been so perturbed ever since it was mentioned that Dave Smukler was by no means a Nevers or a Thorpe against Vanderbilt might note that the Temple star began to improve immediately after the item appeared here . . . Perhaps as a last subtle criticism of the umpiring supplied in the World series Charley Grimm will butcher only 30 hogs this winter. This means the Cubs' manager will have only 60 hams for sale, whereas last winter he disposed of 400.

Investigators of football graft should take a gander at the Fordham Ram. The Maroon mascot is so tough that photographers have to feed him a pack of cigarettes before he will pose for a picture . . . Tom Gibbons, once one of the best heavyweights, now is a sheriff in St. Paul and father of nine children . . . What racing commission is failing to check up on rumors that a trainer bet $200 for an assistant starter so that a horse, notorious as a bad actor at the post, might be assisted in getting off smoothly? . . . Incidentally the horse won . . . Eddie Donaghy, one of the best of all soccer referees, was a member of the Bethlehem Steel eleven which won the American cup in 1914. He scored the goal that beat the Tacony F. C.

They Finally Decide Braddock Is Champ

Now that the William Randolph Hearst A. C. and Madison Square Garden have agreed to kiss, make up and share the profits there seems to be a sudden realization that the Irish Jimmy Braddock, quoted at 1,000 to 1 not so long ago, really is heavyweight champion of the world . . . One reason why Al Barabas of Columbia came to life against Michigan was that he overcame a recently developed habit of spinning around on one leg while dodging through the field. This rendered him extremely vulnerable to tackles and might eventually have resulted in a broken leg . . . Henry Harrar, treasurer of the German-American Football (soccer) association, is a certified public accountant . . . Del Bissonette, who is thirty-six years old and who performed at first base for the pennant-winning Montreal club last season, plans to quit baseball.



Braddock.

The buck-passing and the "holier than thou" business is even better than usual in the Southern conference this year. Several weeks ago Maryland, also slightly vulnerable earlier in the season, protested the eligibility of a North Carolina player named Johnny Sniscak. After a quick investigation the Tar Heels discovered to their vast surprise that Sniscak had played some very good football for several other colleges before becoming one of them. So he was barred from the team and, overcome by a zeal for righteousness which would have been more convincing if it had arrived some months earlier, the university authorities now have decreed that he must also be tossed off the campus. That last, incidentally, in spite of the fact that the youngster pleaded to be permitted to stay and pay his tuition so that he might graduate in June.

Only one eminent racetrack plunger is a heavy plunger. He is Jimmy Owens, known to his intimates as "Yaller." Owens bets on his own selections, won't give them to a soul, makes sure that he is not backing a "stifferoo" and sends it in for place and show . . . Kid Sullivan, formerly a popular welterweight, now is an insurance agent in Brooklyn. He uses his right name, Stephen Tricoma . . . Willie Anderson, another old welter, is a taxi jockey . . . Eddie Plank, Jr., son of the famous pitcher, now is at Penn State and expects to play first base . . . Ray Fisher, once a Yankee pitcher, has another son of a star among his baseball students at Michigan. He is Walter Peckinpaugh, son of Roger, and like his old man an infielder . . . In spite of the best efforts of Broadway writers, who have married him off half a dozen times in recent months, Steve Owens, Giant pro football coach, still is footloose and fancy free.

Peckinpaugh.

Although the player who does it usually is rewarded to the tune of 1,000 or so clinking dollars, Buddy Myer, who led the American league in batting this year, is getting only a song and a dance from his boss, Clark Griffith . . . Colonel Jacob Ruppert, a strong, silent gent when local fans seek information from him, is practically blabbing his head off while touring the country . . . Notre Dame has 40 plays ready for almost any football game but seldom uses more than a dozen of them . . . Jack Doyle, the heavyweight tenor, and his beautiful bride recently moved out of Brooklyn's most celebrated hotel and now reside in a nearby boarding house . . . Does the National league plan to fire three umpires this winter or only two? . . . Answer to "Perplexed Student of History from Ohio State university": No, Teapot Dome never had a football team.

Why do American drivers keep to the right instead of to the left as in England and some Continental countries? In the new Columbia Encyclopedia drivers of the famous Conestoga wagons are credited with originating the custom because they rode the left wheel horse. The wagons, often called "ships of inland commerce," carted freight over the Allegheny mountains before the railroads were built in 1850.

The Conestoga wagon originated in Pennsylvania before the Revolution, according to the encyclopedists. It was pulled by a six-horse team and was capable of carrying a five-ton load. The bottom of the wagon box was curved, rising at both ends so that in going up and down hills the goods would shift less easily and the end-gate be subject to less strain. The prairie-schooner was a modification of the Conestoga wagon.

WASHINGTON DIGEST

National Topics Interpreted

BY WILLIAM BRUCKART

NATIONAL PRESS BLDG. WASHINGTON, D.C.

Our Constitution

Washington.—Several times in these columns I have adverted to criticisms that have been made of the Constitution and have reported the nature of attempts to obtain amendment of that document which is as old as our nation itself. I have reported to you likewise how President Roosevelt, himself, had hinted, if he has not said frankly, that the Constitution ought to be amended so that some of the policies for which he and his New Deal stand could be made operative. I have called attention as well to an apparent assurance that there will be a political campaign battle next year on these questions.

Now, because of developments within the past few weeks, I propose to discuss another phase of these attacks on the Constitution and their concealed purpose. Frankly, I cannot avoid the conclusion that many of the criticisms of our Constitution have as their main objective the clipping of wings of the Supreme court of the United States. I am convinced that many of the demands for amendment of the Constitution to permit broader latitude by congress are nothing more nor less than a disguised move to take away some of the independence which the court has and which, in my opinion, it ought always to possess. Further, I have no doubt that these "borings from within" represent the activities of those individuals of whom there are thousands who are not in sympathy with our form of government. So, if I am to serve my purpose as your observer in Washington, I would fall short of my duty were I not to say that in the election of the next congress lies the answer whether we will retain our Constitution and our traditions as a republic or whether we will lapse into some form of state socialism or of a proletarian government akin to that of Russia.

Supreme Court

It was back in 1904 that the late Chief Justice Edward Douglas White—a former United States senator from the Democratic South and a former Confederate soldier—felt it necessary to make a public observation about the work of our highest legal tribunal. At that time there were certain attacks and criticisms being heard, none of a direct nature, to the general effect that the Supreme court followed the majority opinion of the nation's population. There were likewise veiled remarks that the Supreme court attempted to usurp power which was not its own. Strangely, present-day criticism and attacks have had much the same flavor. To those of that day, Chief Justice White said:

"No instance is afforded from the foundation of the government where an act which was within a power conferred, was declared to be repugnant to the Constitution because it appeared to the judicial mind that the particular assertion of constitutional power was either unwise or unjust."

I have heard, and no doubt you have heard, assertions by unthinking people to the effect that since the court has held some New Deal laws unconstitutional, it was simply old-fashioned, out dated, or as Mr. Roosevelt said, its decisions were taking us back to the "horse and buggy days." Of course, anyone who has observed the Supreme court; anyone who has studied its precepts and examples; anyone who has considered the soundness of its logic and philosophy, cannot help reaching a conclusion that the Supreme court is not now and never has been an agency of government that is susceptible to the effects of rabble rousing or is influenced by suddenly developed waves of public opinion. It has consistently adhered to the principle of interpreting laws and administering justice without regard for the effect of its decisions upon the political plans or aspirations of individuals or groups.

I do not believe that a drive to limit the power of the Supreme court or use it in any other way than as the Constitution's drafters intended will be successful. Many people with whom I have come in contact, however, anticipate a drive of serious import. It may be that they wish to see it or it may be that they believe our Constitution is not sufficiently flexible and that we can hardly change the Constitution without changing the power of the Supreme court. However that may be, it does appear that the time has arrived for those who would be Americans and who would have America last as a Republic to be on their guard and to know before they vote for members of the house and senate whether those members are going to support and defend the Constitution, the Supreme Court and the things for which the Constitution and court stand in our national life. It is a non-partisan question; it is a non-partisan issue, and I think it is of as much importance as any question before the American people today.

All of this is highly important because of pending cases in the Supreme court. I need only recall to you that there are before the court for adjudication cases involving the validity of the Agriculture Adjustment act, the right of the federal government to control labor and employers as it has done in the Guffey Coal bill, the program of government in business as represented by the creation of the Tennessee valley electric layout and the sales of its product in competition with private industry, and four or five others of lesser consequence. I think it is generally agreed that the court will hold some of these legislative policies to be unconstitutional. Certainly, legal opinion is thoroughly divided and some of the lawyers must be right in their guesses as to the court's decrees. In that event, there will be disappointments. Those officials who have sponsored the various programs and projects that are now come into question will suffer because their pride will be hurt. The next step, a result that always obtains, the disappointed ones will attempt to find a goat on whom they can lay the blame. The goat undoubtedly will be the Supreme court but the general reverence held for the court will not permit open attacks upon it. Instead, these disappointed ones will seek to accomplish their purpose in another way, namely, by changes in the Constitution that will curb the power of the court. It will not be the first time that this has been done or that drives against the court have taken place. Proposals to change the power of the court by constitutional amendment or otherwise occurred in 1823, 1826, 1868, in the 1890's and again in 1923. Fortunately, congress rejected those proposals in every instance. It is to be hoped that congress will do it again.

Now, we have a total of four proposals in congress designed to accomplish changes in the power of the court. Probably the most important of these is that by Senator Norris of Nebraska who advocates a constitutional change that would give the Supreme court exclusive power to pass upon constitutional questions of law, and to pass on those questions within six months after enactment of the legislation in question.

On the surface, this would appear to be a meritorious proposition but I have found, in discussing it with men equipped to analyze the proposal, it contains some elements of grave danger. If such a provision were operative at the present time, for instance, it would be easy for some of the brain trust to make it impossible for the court ever to have an opportunity to declare the act constitutional or unconstitutional. The course that was pointed out to me was this: By the expedient of allowing a new law to be inoperative through non-enforcement for a period of six months, its terms could never be brought into question. If the administrative official did not seek to enforce the law and bring violators to the bar of the court within the six-month period the law would go on the statute books until repealed by congress.

Norris' Argument

Senator Norris likewise has argued that the Supreme court should never be allowed to declare an act unconstitutional unless two-thirds of the nine justices were in agreement in that regard. He has bitterly opposed rulings of the court which were decided on a five to four basis; so it seems the Nebraska senator may have a beautiful theory that could easily go off at a tangent when applied to humans.

Most of the other proposals now in congress will get nowhere in congressional consideration and, therefore, reference to them will be omitted. It remains as a possibility, however, that the next election could bring in enough rabble-rousing demagogues to put through resolutions proposing that the Constitution be amended. Of course, those resolutions from congress have to be adopted by the 48 states but it has always been the case that if proposed amendments to the Constitution are checked in congress the major battle has been won.

I do not know, nor do I care to predict, how the farmers of the country will react to a decision by the Supreme court holding AAA unconstitutional. Certainly, they will be disappointed but whether this disappointment will result in a concerted movement by them to amend the Constitution to permit operation of present AAA policies is a question only time can answer. There is this much that can be said, however, and it has no relation to politics: I believe they will regret it if they seek to open up the Constitution to amendments. If they do succeed, they will then find that all of the other interests in this country will be clamoring for changes and the result probably be a muddy mess.

"Deadwood Dick"

"Deadwood Dick" was Richard W. Clarke (1845-1930) and he was a frontiersman of the Black Hills district. Joining a party bound for gold digging in that region, he became a noted character, taking part in the Sioux wars, acting as express guard on stage coaches and aiding United States marshals in suppressing lawlessness. His alliterative name was popularized by dime-novel writers.

I HOPE you heard ZaSu Pitts when she did "Dulcy" on the radio; it was a relief to hear her and not one of her imitators. Incidentally, she's quite interested in those girls who do impersonations of her; says she's always wanted to hear one, but somehow she just never has. And I wish you might know that same ZaSu Pitts; you'd like her so much. She journeyed to New York to do that broadcast, and spent most of her time shopping for her children—her daughter, who is thirteen, and her adopted son (Barbara LaMarr's little boy, you'll recall), who is a little younger. She started out at the crack of dawn each morning and was on hand when the stores opened, to buy simple frocks and sweaters and suits. And very smart she looked, too, dressed in dark blue—her favorite color.

ZaSu Pitts.

She was besieged with offers to do more broadcasts; Ben Bernie, for one, wanted her on his program. She was urged to go on the stage; one remarkably good offer was made for her to do a sketch in a new show—but she turned them all down. Wanted to go home to her family. For she's a family woman; children and husband come first, and her career afterward.

Have you heard that early, early morning program on the radio—the Milkmen's Matinee? It's very popular, not only with the milkmen, but also at open-all-night lunch carts, and lots of requests pour in for special numbers.

Major Bowes' genial "All right, all right" is fast becoming a byword all over the country; one of our best football announcers loves to use it. Incidentally, honors are being heaped on the Major so fast that it's hard to keep track of them. Recently a new wing of the Kernan Hospital for Crippled Children, in Baltimore, was dedicated to him.

Fred MacMurray's rapid climb to the movie heights should encourage everyone who wants to go into the movies. Two years ago he couldn't get even an extra job One year ago he worked in "The Gilded Lily," with Claudette Colbert, the first screen work he'd had except for a small part in "Grand Old Girl" with May Robson. Since then he's been rushed from one picture to another, because you and I and all the people like us liked him. He's played opposite Katharine Hepburn, Carole Lombard and Claudette Colbert again.

Well, we had our Dickens cycle in pictures (and it isn't over yet, apparently, for W. C. And unless Paramount's Gary Cooper plays the hero in the first named of these, there's no justice!

It looks as if "She Married Her Boss" might prove to be Claudette Colbert's most successful picture; theaters in the big cities have been holding it over.

World Wheat Supply Is Cut 330,000,000 Bushels

This year's world wheat supply will be about 330,000,000 bushels less than in 1934-35, according to the Bureau of Agricultural Economics report on world wheat prospects.

Production is estimated at about 3,430,000,000 bushels and the world carryover outside of Russia at 800,000,000 bushels, or a total of about 4,230,000,000 bushels. Production last year was 3,450,000,000 bushels and carryover 1,100,000,000 bushels, or a total of about 4,550,000,000 bushels. The short crops this year will reduce world carryover by the end of this season to between 400,000,000 and 500,000,000 bushels, or not much more than normal world carryover prior to 1928.

IRON DOG GROWLS

The use to which the phototube, popularly known as the electric eye, is put are literally numberless. One of the most peculiar is used by a practical joker to give voice to an iron dog on his lawn. When a visitor approaches he is startled by growls, for on his approach he interrupts a beam of light focused on an electric eye and that sets off the vocal mechanism—a big, raucous buzzer.—Oil Power.

"Calumet sure gives you your money's worth, with that Big New 10¢ Can!"

SAYS MRS. W. W. HICKEY, OF CHICAGO, ILL.

"THERE'S a lot of good baking in that 10c can of Calumet," observes Mrs. Hickey. "It's worth more than a dime any day!

"Of course, with my big family I get the full-pound can—and it's only 25c now. As long as I bake, Calumet will be in my pantry!"

Grandfather Rommel, who was a baker for 40 years, says: "Calumet takes the guesswork out of the job nowadays."

WHAT makes Calumet so dependable? Why is it different from other baking powders? Calumet combines two distinct leavening actions. A quick action for the mixing bowl—set free by liquid. A slower action for the oven—set free by heat. This Double-Action produces perfect leavening.

All Calumet prices are lower! Calumet is now selling at the lowest prices in its history . . . The regular price of the Full-Pound Can is now only 25c! And ask to see the new 10c can—a lot of good baking for a dime—with Calumet, the Double-Acting Baking Powder. A product of General Foods.

Stanley Heath, a stranger whose powerboat runs aground on the treacherous Cape Cod shoals, stumbles into the Homestead and into the life of Marcia Howe, a young widow with whom half the men in the village are already in love. Out of his clothing falls a leather case crammed with gems and the enigma of this puzzling possession provides the pivot around which the story revolves. Marcia's blind, intuitive belief in the man's innocence brings its own reward.

CONTROL OF CREDIT A BASIC QUESTION

Economist Describes Conflict Between Opposing Social Viewpoints on Government Bank.

Agitation for government banking is a phase of the conflict between our present "personal competitive enterprise system" in America and the "compulsory state collective security system" of several European States, Virgil Jordan, President National Industrial Conference Board, says in an article in a recent issue of "Banking" published by the American Bankers Association.

"They involve irreconciliable principles of human conduct and philosophy of life and the conflict between them is the key to the economic, social and political struggles of today," Mr. Jordan says.

The enterprise system of which "the development of the United States has been the unparalleled example, depends for its motive power of progress upon the inexhaustible reservoir of energy in individual desire for personal advancement in prosperity, but it guarantees nothing to the individual save freedom of opportunity," the article says in part.

The collectivist security system, he says, "places all emphasis upon the maintenance of a minimum standard of living for the mass without regard to the creative power of the individual. Quite simply the security system involves the modern form of the philosophy of the slave society." He continues:

A Sign of the Times

"The many-sided movement toward governmental banking, deposit insurance and currency management is the most direct and decisive expression of the universal instinctive search for security which is the sign of the times. In America our so-called social security legislation is an important indication of the drift away from the enterprise system toward a collectivist security system with concentration of authority in a central Federal government.

"The nationalization of credit is crucial and indispensible for complete state control of the complex industrial and business structure of this country. The drive toward government banking and monetary control is most determined because the relation of the state to credit goes to the root of the enterprise system. A collective security system is inconceivable without nationalization of credit. An enterprise system is inconceivable with it."

Under a collective security system, based on government banking the controls "lie solely in the hands of a few persons and depend upon their judgment, will or caprice," Mr. Jordan says, adding that it is they who must determine "upon the basis of some predetermined plan or upon pure political expediency of the moment, what lines of industry and even what individual enterprises shall have access to the credit reservoir." The state, he says, has the power of life and death over all enterprise that utilizes credit.

"Every government is an organ of party power and must respond to the will of the party that put it in power," the Jordan article says. "Under unchecked government operation it is an inescapable tendency of every currency to depreciate and for credit to expand. However much it may be in the interest of the nation, deflation is too dangerous politically for any government to undertake it deliberately.

"In the end government banking and currency management resolve themselves simply into the use of credit as a political instrument of power, and this instrument tends to be used in the long run for expropriation of the savings of the community."

A Mud Laker's Pleading For The Retainment Of Mud Lake

A few thoughts has come to my mind in regards to Mud Lake. I moved to Mud Lake three years ago with my family and all my belongings. I have prospered both in wisdom and riches. I enjoy living there. I enjoy its beautiful scenery. As I look out over the meadows I see herds of cattle and sheep grazing on the finest grasses that ever grew. I see haystacks in countless numbers. I see fields of golden grain nodding and bowing to the wind. I see good roads and beautiful trees, well tended farms and beautiful homes.

Since I knew and saw Mud Lake some 25 or 30 years ago, when it was in its original state, a water sogged swamp and floating bog, it is a miracle to me that such transformation could have taken place in such a short time.

It was the will of the All Mighty, it was the desire of our forefathers, our County Board and our District Judges that this transformation should take place in order to make Marshall and adjacent counties a better place in which to live by cutting ditches to let the water flow away.

Their efforts and good judgement have proven not to have been done in vain.

I make this pleading to you pioneers who went out there and took up your homesteads. To you who have endured the trials and hardships of a pioneer life. To you who have spent the best part of your lives there in hard labor transforming your homesteads from their raw state into productive farms and beautiful homes. To you who, with your helpmates have raised your families in these homes that you choose from Uncle Sams domain, are you willing to see your children's childhood homes destroyed?

I have seen men and women from abroad with tears in their eyes when words have been spoken or songs have been sung of their homeland because the words and songs have brought back to them memories of their childhood homes. It makes no difference where your children go in this world, the memories of their childhood homes will alwoys follow them. If they should desire to make a visit to their childhood homes and play-grounds, should they find them preserved in the same or a better condition than they were when they left, or shall they find them in ruin and be driven back by mosquitoes and other parasites that inhabit the water sogged swamps?

I say to you men and women who have been instrumental in bringing about this transformation. Are we going to lag back into a state of wilderness and uncivilization, or are we going to stay on the road to prosperity and happiness?

Oh, Lord our father I come to thee in pleading and prayer. Teach us to understand right and wrong. Thou art the creator of Heaven and earth and all that is therein. Thou made mankind the most intelligent of all creation. Thou has given us this earth in which to live in a fair and upright way. Let us therefore labor in an intelligent way so as to better our condition and the condition of our fellow men. Thou has created the wilderness and the wild life that dwells therein. Thou feeds, shelters and protect them by Natures way. If it is thy will that wilderness give way to civilization let it so be done.

Teach us to understand that our domestic animals are a part of our living. Let us therefore keep them in comfort and good condition to the best of our ability. Teach us to understand that our health is our most precious gift. Let us therefore work intelligently to safeguard our health and the health of our fellow men. Let us therefore not dam the water that it may create a breeding place for mosquitos and flies to pester our lives and the lives of our animals. Let us not dam the water so that it may create a stagnant pool that may impair our health. But let the water flow away so that we may till the soil intelligently and receive the fruit and blessings thereof, lest more of us will be on the relief and charity rolls.

This world has always had to contend with those who have laid plans for the benefit of their own selfish folly seeking to undo what others have done, and to tear down what others have built. For those I offer these words, "Forgive them for they know not what they do."

Hjalmer Johnson.

A major game law violation was uncovered when Hjalmer, Johnson, 20, and Charles Langhery, 35, pleaded guilty at Bemidji to the charge of shooting Moose in the Red Lake Game Refuge.

Corn-Hog Survey Plans Announced By Howard

The final compliance survey of the 1935 corn-hog adjustment program will begin December 2, announces Mr. Tom Howard, chairman of the Marshall County corn-hog allotment committee.

A compliance supervisor will visit each farm under contract, and check the number of hogs on hand and the depth of silage in the silo. The silage must be checked, Mr. Howard explains, because the corn-hog contract requires the producer to have filled his silo this year to the same average level as he filled it in 1932 and 1933, and with corn of the same average quality.

The supervisor will also examine the contract signer's records showing the number of hogs he has bought and sold during the year ending November 30, 1935. His report will be used by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration in determining whether or not the contract signer should receive his final 1935 corn-hog payment, due on or about January 1, 1936.

The corn-hog compliance reports for all Minnesota farms will be audited in St. Paul this year, instead of in Washington, as in 1934. This change should make for speedier handling of the reports after they leave the county.

The allotment committee has notified all Marshall county corn-hog contract signers to dispose of all hogs in excess of the number permitted by their contracts before December, 1, Mr. Howard says. It has also asked them to have their sales and purchase evidence ready and their feeder hogs and home farrowed hogs penned separately when the supervisor calls. Compliance with these suggestions will hasten the completion of the survey and speed the payment of cash benefits.

Safetygrams
BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

I have often wondered how rural communities select the drivers of school buses. Is this done in a sort of indifferent way and is the job given to anybody?

Every school bus driver should be selected for dependability, good habits, his knowlede of the rules of the road, and a tested ability to drive a bus properly. No driver should be hired below the age of 21 to drive a school bus.

Every driver should be provided with a set of rules which he must observe to the letter. His is a heavy responsibity and the continuance of his employment should depend on his hearty and faithful acceptance of this responsibility.

No bus driver should drive a school bus for more than 10 hours in and 24 hour period.

He should go slow - - and be safe.

"Look here," said Kerrigan, sitting forward with a slight jounce of decision, "do you mind if I ask if you're making a fool of yourself?"

"No," said Hal, pretending coolness. "Not a bit. But you don't expect me to be an authority, do you? Or do you think I'm such a fool that I make one of myself consciously."

"I s'pose you have to get red-headed," said Kerrigan evenly, "but I'm giving you credit for sense enough not to think your own ideas are the only ones worth anything."

"Thanks," said Hal without grace.

"I don't like butting into other people's business," Kerrigan went on. "The curse of the world is people trying to run other people. And I'm not asking you this for fun, or because I like to hear myself talk."

Hal looked at Kerrigan's complete, quiet gravity and felt the disrespect of being stretched on the bed while his senior sat solicitously forward. He raised himself from the pillows and swung his feet to the floor. "I'm sorry, Colonel. I don't see why you should give a curse about my business. I'm thankful that you do." He'd tell Kerrigan all about it—everything. That might be good to do: perhaps, telling him, his blood and his brain would rouse out of their coma.

Kerrigan began soberly. "If you don't want to tell me what's happened, say so. But if you want to break it out, I want to hear it. And I said 'want to,' not 'willing to.'"

"Colonel, I want to tell you," said Hal, a gentleness on his mind as well as on his voice. "I—I just wanted to wait, that was all. Here—if you'll listen—here's the whole thing: start to—to finish."

Hal told him a story so orderly and simple that he surprised himself—from the first hour in New York, when Larsen had been so sure Barry and Crack were together, from his first sense of something wrong that rode with them in the car through to watching Barry go up the walk to the hotel in Hollywood. And all the while he spoke, Barry sat in shining green satin, holding herself hard on that bed four hundred and more hot miles away, staring darkly into the shabby corner.

"That's it," said Hal in quiet conclusion. "And I can't tell you—can't tell myself—what it was when I saw Crack standing in her room and knew why he could be there. Since then it's been like coming out of fever: you know something's happened inside you but you don't know what. I loved her, I guess—must've. I don't hate her now—don't seem to be able to feel about her at all. I only hate him; and I'd hate him even if he'd done nothing to me, even if he didn't hate me, too."

"So what?" said Kerrigan.

Hal gave a single, flat laugh. "Nothing," he said: "except I'm going to keep my father out of the dirty mess if I have to—if it kills me."

Kerrigan sat down casually and said, "Out of what dirty mess?"

Hal looked at him sharply for a hint of the joke, but there was no joke in Kerrigan's gravely commanding eyes.

"I mean why is it suddenly dirty after Crack comes into it?" Kerrigan explained in a patient, scholastic manner. "You knew she was married. Who did you expect her husband to be?"

"I didn't expect him to be a stealthy, pale louse of a man, watching us, right there making his dirty plans while his—his girl got a prospect ready."

Kerrigan said, "Oh," lifting his head in slight, ironic comprehension. "She made you come to her room last night."

"No," said Hal defensively.

"As a matter of fact, she asked you not to."

"Yes, but—"

"But when you came, she didn't keep you out. When you were inside, she didn't do the perfectly natural thing—throw you through the window or scream for help. That it?"

"When that—that lazy spider came in and locked the door," said Hal; "when he stood there as if he owned her, as if he had me backed into the slimy corner where he wanted me, she never said a word, never made a sound. She went over and sat on the bed and stared into the corner, and I don't believe she even listened. And — G—d, Kerrigan, d'you think I wanted to believe it?"

"Believe what?" said Kerrigan, still gravely waiting. "Mind telling me what's this 'it' you didn't want to believe?"

Hal curbed his miserable exasperation. "I didn't want to believe what I had to believe—that she didn't mind her rotten little husband's catching me; I didn't want to believe that it meant more to her to keep her promise, her rotten bargain with Crack—much more—than to—to—"

"Hal," said Kerrigan in an unmoved patience of voice that left Hal's insurgent anger dangling, "have you thought back? Have you thought of what you have a right to think? I tell you you sound as if you were talking just to hear a noise, sticking up for what you've done just because you did it."

"Stick up!" said Hal, leaning forward to look at Kerrigan from under drawn, incredulous brows. "What the devil d'you s'pose I've been doing for a day and half a night except thinking back? What—" He jerked his head aside, a sound of exasperation breathed in his throat. Think back! As if he needed to, supposing he could. Coming back from Santa Barbara he'd think—and find his rightness twice as strong.

Kerrigan said, politely, "Will you listen to me a little longer?" and waited for Hal to answer.

"Certainly," said Hal, with an ironic inclination of his head.

"She made no secret of being married?"

"No," said Hal. "That wasn't so stupid, either."

"Did she ever want you to leave her alone, ask you to make up your mind to separating—here?"

"Yes," Hal agreed readily. "And of course it was to be expected I'd do it—right away—specially after she'd told me she cared about me."

"Mm," said Kerrigan. "Telling you she loved you made it harder for you; but your telling her shouldn't've amounted to—"

Kerrigan started into something vigorous, but he took palpable hold of himself before his breath was full-drawn. And his voice was leashed to some fragile stanchion of patience as he said: "All right, she didn't care. But it's not impossible to think of somebody in her place who would've. Take another girl then, with a built-in feeling about a promise to her dying father. She's got warm, quick blood in her veins, not New England spring-water. She falls for a fella as she never expected to—a fella in just your position. She wants to find some way out for both of them, and she wants to keep him out of harm. But she isn't any more super-human than she should be; she's made of flesh and feeling, weakness and desire—not billiard-ball composition and missionary tracts.

"But She Is Not 'Appy—Not at All."

"I s'p[illegible] she should've told you it was C[illegible] she was tied to, right at the beginning. That would have made everything simple, wouldn't it? You could've wrung his neck in Iowa somewhere and gone to jail with the happy knowledge that you'd made everything perfect for both of you."

"I couldn't've bought him, could I?" said Hal, his hot tone just off trembling. "Wringing his neck would've been the only thing in the world to do."

"Sure you could have bought him," said Kerrigan. "And he'd have stayed bought, too—never bothered either of you again. You could have bought him, and a dead man's dread of shame and a last promise and fifteen or twenty years of love and care and teaching. And with all that bought and paid for, she wouldn't feel that somebody'd shoveled dirt all over her in a thing she wanted kept decent."

"She certainly kept it nice and clean this way," said Hal, with a half laugh that somehow turned its taint back on himself.

"Of course it's she that's done everything," Kerrigan agreed. "To her this thing was all like the plot of a book she'd just finished; she knew what was going to happen; no excuse for her making any mistakes. Human beings don't make mistakes." Hal drew breath to interrupt, but Kerrigan tightened his calm as he went on, "You remember a time when we three were at lunch somewhere and she asked you if you were Frederick Ireland's son?"

"Oh, yes," said Hal drily. "There was some special innocent reason why she wanted to know, too, I remember."

"You told her you were Ireland's son. Did she ever show any sign of thinking you'd lied to her?"

"So then she told Crack you were Ireland. That's what made it so easy for you to bluff Crack, I s'pose."

Hal was scared then and he knew it; but there was still the necessity of getting away whole from the room before he beat down these swarmings of fear.

The chill in Kerrigan's voice began to warm ominously now as he went on. "You come into Barry's life with enough sense—after a while—to know what she is: lovely as morning, brave as a bullet, honorable as a sword, chaste as water. You have the criminal luck to make her fall in love with you—the one thing that could happen to make her life about ten times harder to handle.

"What do you think about then? About the help you can give her? About the way you can bring her to her happiness, as well as yours? About the honor and conscience and courage that's in her even to try to fight a thing she'd go to hell to get? No! You think about how unfair she is to you. You think you ought to walk in and wipe out twenty years of her father in a week, with the honor of a last promise to boot. You think she ought to see that your happiness is all that counts, all that makes the world fit to grow little apples in.

"She puts up with that—for the only reason under God's sky there could be for putting up with it. And you drive ahead between your blinders till you drive on to the last edge of the one thing she hoped to keep you out of. And when that one thing happens too, what do you do? Like a shot. You leave her to stew. You let her kill her own heart so that you'll go on your way; and you go on it. Go on it with your head full of the most important thing in the world, a fundamental of all decency outraged, all good in everything ended—because you, you were made to look like a fool for a few days in another man's little mind. Ireland, you ought to lie down on that floor and die."

Hal's teeth were clenched terribly upon red anger, curdling shame, panic; and he turned so that Kerrigan shouldn't see those things stinging into his eyes. For an instant he thought he could keep his voice unshaken—in a cool, ironic smoothness that would wither Kerrigan. "So she had it happen," he said; "she had Crack catch me there—so that I'd be free, so that I'd—" The urgency of his despair came thick into his throat, and he broke off.

Kerrigan's stillness filled the room—cruel, steady, incriminating; and Hal had to keep his scalding vision on him so that something shouldn't snap in his head, a signal for madness. The brown eyes watching him could never have been warm, never friendly, never merciful; frozen in accusation, personality was gone from them—even the personality of contempt. Dread braced itself hard in Hal as Kerrigan rose, a judge at Doomsday, with the extinct cigarette far from incongruous in the corner of his merciless lips.

"Vain," he said quietly: "Vain, stuck-up, self-indulgent, flabby, without faith except in the importance of money. Why did I think you weren't so cheap?"

The last word lashed Hal to his feet, and it took all his quivering strength to force definition upon the thick words that came of themselves: "Kerrigan, you're a liar. A G—d-d—d liar! And if you were young—" Something was strangling him inside his throat.

It was as if torture, finally released upon him, came to full impact upon the numb obstinacy of his faculties, with a tautly balanced rocking to show that something must plunge massively away in the next second. Hal found his desperate voice again, and in a quicker anger he cried at Kerrigan: "You're right. It's true—every rotten word of it's true."

He went to Kerrigan, took his big arms above the elbow, and sank his forehead awkwardly to the bulky shoulder. "Heaven forgive me," he said in the calm of an exhausted breath. "You, Colonel, you've got to forgive me, you—" He rolled his head a little against the shoulder for want of any words, then let it rest there.

In a moment Kerrigan's hands came up under Hal's elbows and moved them gently. "I'm glad you didn't like it any better'n I did," he said, his voice low, untriumphant—deeply comforting around an odd sort of humility.

Like a divine intercession to spare them both an impasse of embarrassment, the telephone bell broke into startled clamor, and Hal went to it without looking at Kerrigan. It was Sister Anastasia—ready now to go.

"You'll call Barry up, Colonel," Hal said quickly. "To be sure she's there. You'll keep her there: do anything, tell her anything to keep her there safe till I can get to her, till"—Hal's voice lowered to a pitch of bitter shame—"till I can kneel in dirt to her."

Kerrigan nodded, saying hurriedly, "Yes, but move: get back soon's you can."

"Six hours outside," said Hal, glancing at his watch. "Back by midnight sure. And, Colonel, look—do anything, anything to me, but don't ever talk to me like that again, will you."

"D'you spec I could, even if I ever had to?" he said softly.

When Hal got to the place where Sister Anastasia was waiting, he felt he was somehow serving Barry in disciplining himself to the nun's service.

Anastasia's eyes were reticently animated. She said:

"I did not know when I telephoned you: they 'ave told me there is a train to Santa Barbara in twenty minutes; and they 'ave given me money for my ticket, from my brother."

"Ah, but sister," said Hal in sincere reproof, "I was so happy to take you myself. I want to."

"I was 'appy, too," she said, keeping her eyes from him till she'd said it. Then, looking up at him with tranquil sureness: "But she is not 'appy—not at all. You can do something for 'er—now, tonight—instead of taking me on this long journey."

Leaves Over 600 Living Offspring; 5 Generations

Over six hundred living descendants have been left by Engel Dine Janssen, a widow who has died at Esens, East Frisia, at the age of ninety-one years. The old lady had one husband and fourteen children, ten of whom married young, having in their turn an average of ten children apiece. These grandchildren married young in their turn, till at the end of her life Frau Janssen could point proudly to five generations of offspring.

Her family, from children to great-great-great-grandchildren, was spread over the whole region and beyond it.

A cleansing dose today; a smaller quantity tomorrow; less each time, until bowels need no help at all.

ANY mother knows the reason when her child stops playing, eats little, is hard to manage. Constipation. But what a pity so few know the sensible way to set things right!

A liquid laxative is the answer, mothers. The answer to all your worries over constipation. A liquid can be measured. The dose can be exactly suited to any age or need. Just reduce the dose each time, until the bowels are moving of their own accord and need no help.

This treatment will succeed with any child and with any adult.

The doctors use liquid laxatives. Hospitals use the liquid form. If it is best for their use, it is best for home use. The liquid laxative most families use is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. Any druggist has it.

More Humble About Our Opinions in New Kinship

At the moment, many people are deploring "a lack of leadership" in religion, says Lloyd C. Douglas in Cosmopolitan. "In my opinion, the confessed bewilderment of the churches is a sign of health and progress. The recent use of the soft pedal has made the prophet of more value to the people. They sense an intellectual kinship with the honest man who admits he is a bit at a loss to know exactly where we are.

"Editors who were used to saying the last word necessary for the adequate instruction of their constituents are writing in phrases tempered by a new shyness. Statesmen, teachers, parents, even half-grown children are no longer laying down their beliefs with a bang. We are all becoming humble about our opinions. This is the type of kinship we have needed more seriously than any other. It is somewhere along this road that we may find our peace."

MILLIONS now know the smart thing is to carry a roll of Tums, always. Heartburn, gas, and other symptoms of acid indigestion have a habit of occurring at unexpected times. You don't have to drench your stomach with harsh alkalies which physicians have long warned may make the tendency toward acid indigestion worse. Tums, a real scientific advancement, contain no soda or other alkalies. Instead a wonderful antacid that simply neutralizes stomach acidity, the balance passing out of the body inert. Pleasant to eat as candy. Only 10c a roll. Put a roll in your pocket now.

Ignore Civil Service

Washington.—One of the New Deal policies about which there is an ever increasing complaint is its wanton destruction of the civil service. It used to be said, under Democratic and Republican administrations alike, that it was next to impossible to get a government job except through examinations conducted by the Civil Service commission. That is, there were few appointments available other than under civil service below the rank of Presidential selection. Now, the scene has changed to such an extent that there is little chance to get in the government through civil service and the bulk of the appointments therefore are of a purely politically-indorsed character.

I do not mean to say that the Civil Service commission has shut up shop, although it has been virtually dehorned, but I do emphasize that as of September 30—the latest pay roll figures for the government—the number of civil service workers was only slightly more than half of the total on the government pay roll exclusive of the army, navy and Marine corps and Civilian Conservation corps.

The Civil Service commission continues to issue its monthy statements on the government personnel but they are becoming increasingly less reliable because one of the most difficult things to get in Washington these days is the accurate figure on the number of workers employed by Uncle Sam. The commission records are complete as far as they go but they fail to go far enough. At this time, for example, the Civil Service commission reports that the government pay roll covers 794,467 employees. That figure, however, does not include the vast army of employees of the Agricultural Adjustment administration who are scattered in every county in the nation. I have heard estimates that the number of these county chairmen, inspectors, investigators, etc., exceeds 110,000 but whether that is too large or too small I cannot be sure for the reason that there is no way by which the number can be checked. Similarly, it is next to impossible to ascertain the number of workers in some of the newer agencies, created under the guise of emergency conditions, because they too are scattered far and wide but the fact remains that the personnel of the government has been expanded more rapidly than ever in history and to the highest recorded peak even for war time.

Personnel Increases

The number of employees on June 30 was given by the commission as 719,440 from which it will be seen there has been an increase of more than 75,000 in three months. That is, there has been that much of an increase for which the commission has records, but again it must be remarked that the commission has no way of compelling some of the alphabetical agencies to supply it regularly with the number of employees on their pay rolls.

The number of federal employees aside from the military services when Mr. Roosevelt took office was approximately 585,000. The number of employees on the federal pay roll when Mr. Coolidge retired and Mr. Hoover became President was roughly 545,000. From these the enormous growth of the government bureaucracy is at least hinted if not demonstrated fully.

Then, there are more yet to come. Several new agencies were created under acts of the last congress and others have since been created by executive order of the President. Take the Rural Rehabilitation administration, for example. Prof. Rexford Guy Tugwell, who used to be brain truster No. 1, has a fund of $250,000,000 with which to play and obviously Mr. Tugwell will need a great staff to assist him. The National Youth administration is another new one. It will not have as much money as Mr. Tugwell but it is starting its operation with $50,000,000—and that is quite a chunk of money to most of us. The National Labor board is hardly organized yet and the Social Security board has just begun to arrange a setup. Likewise the board to administer the Guffey coal law—a little NRA for the soft coal industry—has been appointed and is operating with only a few clerks. It cannot get along without a sizable corps of inspectors and examiners and investigators. It will have to have an extensive research staff in order that it can be supplied at all times with whatever facts and figures it needs or wants. So it goes on through the list almost unending.

One newspaper columnist had the audacity to say in his column the other day that if Relief Administrator Harry Hopkins really wants to solve the unemployment problem he ought to turn his attention to the government itself. At the rate of expansion, the government probably could be made to absorb the 3,500,000 unemployed to whom Mr. Hopkins was preparing to give work by December 1.

* * *

Where's the Jobs?

December 1 is hereabouts. But Mr. Hopkins has not succeeded in his much publicized plan to give all of the 3,500,000 unemployed workers jobs. He was doomed to failure from the start. He announced, it will be remembered, that all federal relief was to end on November 1, by which time he figured that made-work would be available for the 3,500,000. This figure was the topmost limit for which the federal government was to be responsible. The states and municipalities were to take care of the remainder of roughly 5,000,000 who had to have help.

November 1 came along and Mr. Hopkins changed the date to December 1. He did this after consultation with the President who announced with considerable emphasis that he meant just what he said and that federal relief was going to stop as of December 1. But it seems the machinery was too ponderous to get in motion in time to absorb all of these workers. Most folks recognized it weeks ago but Mr. Hopkins steadfastly clung to his dream and that dream, like so many others, was dissipated in the thin air and sank almost without trace.

Serious Problem

On top of this Hopkins failure has come a serious problem. It is serious for the administration not only because of the fact that winter is coming on and people must be fed and clothed but it is delicate from the political standpoint. In the last few weeks a considerable number of complaints have reached Washington officials from those who were provided with work. They contend that the government wage rate is insufficient to meet their needs. This results from the increased cost of living—higher prices for food and clothing and the other necessaries of life.

The administration is being blamed for this condition. Opponents of the New Deal are capitalizing this discontent. They are saying to the folks who find the wages too small that they have been made the victim of New Deal policies, such as tampering with the currency, nationalizing silver, paying bounties for reduced production on the farms and the like.

The upshot of the situation is that not only those on made-work who are paid by the government and those who are on legitimate pay rolls of industry are becoming thoroughly dissatisfied. They are demanding more money. I do not believe anyone can forecast what will happen. One thing is certain: if industry must increase wages, consumers will have to pay the price. There will be further increases in the things we all buy in event higher wages are obtained from commerce and industry. And, if the government raises wages to those on made-work, the drain on the treasury will be correspondingly faster. The taxpayer has to pay this. So all in all there is a difficult problem to be solved by the President and his relief advisers.

It's Some Big Job

Few of us ever stop to think what a job it is to maintain the supply of money in circulation. Omitting any consideration of the paper currency which keeps the gigantic bureau of printing and engraving operating 24 hours each day and considering only the coins that jingle, it requires the operation of two or three great plants to mint our money.

The bureau of the mint in the treasury gave out some figures the other day that seem to me to be most interesting. They are interesting because of their size. On the basis of these figures, it is calculated that there are actually in the pockets of the American people the following number of coins, each figure being an approximation: 1,000,000,000 dimes, 1,400,000,000 nickels, 5,500,000,000 pennies, 400,000,000 quarters, 200,000,000 half dollars and approximately 33,000,000 silver dollars.

These figures furnish an interesting commentary as well on our present modes of living. They supply a sidelight on our system of taxation which calls for pennies, nickels and dimes here, there and everywhere as a result of sales taxes. Besides, transportation systems like the street cars call for an exceptionally large quantity of the minor coins like nickels and dimes. One could enumerate a score of factors in modern life that compel each of us to carry and use these small coins.

The mint bureau is authority also for the information that even this stupendous sum of minor coins seems insufficient. The mints, accordingly, have been speeded up and they are now working at a rate almost double that of 1934. How much further they will have to expand cannot be foretold, but as an innocent bystander, I fear that if I have to carry coins in any greater number than I have had them loaded in my pockets, it is going to mean new business for the tailors. They will have steady work replacing trouser pockets.

Discipline of Seamen

Danger at sea may bring out either the best or the worst traits of human nature. Nothing can be more inspiring than the general discipline and courage shown on shipboard in most emergencies; nothing more sickening than the manifestation of panic in exceptional cases. In this respect a great responsibility devolves upon the commander. It is he who sets the example for both crew and passengers.

what Irvin S. Cobb thinks about:

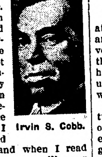
SANTA MONICA, CALIF.—All is excitement in London. The prince of Wales has adopted a new style in trouserings called the "straight outline."

With no desire to be morbid, I've gone into the fascinating details. I glean from the cablegrams that they touch the wearer in but one place, and only then if his royal highness is sitting down. When walking, he has to take two steps while the trousers are taking one. It's as though Slim Summerville swiped my things and was trying to escape with the goods on. I shall not follow the royal example. As a snappy dresser I never seem to get anywhere, somehow. George Ade once said no matter what I put on I still looked like Paducah, Ky., and when I read what the well-dressed man will wear I sorrowfully admit there's nothing correct about me except my back collar button and I'm not so sure about that. It's one of those plain bone ones—nothing flashy.



Irvin S. Cobb.

So I shall continue to stick to the garments enclosing me at the moment. They are, as you might say, my pre-depression pants. In youth they sheltered me; I'll not desert them now. Besides, I might be arrested.

* * *

Hollywood Hermits.

IF YOU'VE been to Movieland, you've seen our fur-bearing hermits. As true recluses, these gentlemen have the innate desire to avoid being conspicuous, which is ever characteristic of Hollywood. So they march the principal streets all day, with their long hair and their ditto whiskers waving in the climate, and wearing as few clothes as the law allows—and out here we allow few indeed.

There is a single member of the group who's different. He's just as woolly as the others, but he doesn't parade up and down. Nor will he tell you his name or the address of his cave, or where he came from or where he's going. Some think he has a secret past. But I think he has a great ambition.

It's my idea he wants to go down in history as the one who was not commissioned a colonel on the staff of the governor of Kentucky.

* * *

The Legacy of Youth.

IN THE brave days before '28 the future of an ambitious young graduate was assured. He sold bonds. Statistics show there was a salesman for every bond. Shortly thereafter, any fellow who owned a bond was his own salesman.

I still have some very beautiful ones which I'd like to swap for a pair of moss-agate cuff buttons, a ukulele, a collection of postage stamps or what have you?

Then followed the dreary years when the youth with a diploma had nowhere to head in—desperate, hopeless years. But now—now he needn't worry any more about a career. It's all fixed. He can step out of college right into a CCC camp.

I am ashamed—trying to be funny over a most grim tragedy. It doesn't matter about our generation, the mad architects of this disaster. We're too numbed by blows, some of us, to start over; too old, some of us, even to try; too stupid to admit that, by futile war, by speculation, by crazed extravagance, we laid this burden upon our children and our children's children.

We have sowed in folly; they must reap the bitter grain.

* * *

GOOD times are certainly coming back—at least to the fur business. I hear prices are so high that only the wealthier minks can afford their own skins; the rest of them will go through the winter wearing dyed rabbit.

I went to a party and nearly every woman there was up to her ears in ermine or chinchilla or silver fox or some other very exclusive peltry. There was one large lady who had on at least three kinds of expensive wild animals. If somebody had left the door open, her wrap would have stolen right back to the zoo.

It's fine prosperity is returning. Wouldn't it be grand if, instead of being visited on a favored few, it could be passed around?

* * *

Crooning to Oysters.

THE professional crooner has found his musical soul-mate. It's our famous Pacific coast bi-valve, that winsome creature which is about the size of a suspender button.

A Seattle judge experimented on the harmonic affinities of shell fish. He didn't get anywhere with the clam, clams being proverbially dumb, but, working on our cunning little native oyster, he first established its natural vibration, then found a note to correspond. Do that, and an oyster opens right up.

Back to American Names; We Have Individuality

A German historian, who has come to this country to take notes on the cities, towns and villages named after Hanover, Germany, says that there are no less than 77 of these in the United States. And there are, also, according to the same authority, 66 Hamburgs, 22 Bremens and 22 Brunswicks in this country.

The number of places in the United States named after places in Great Britain and on the continent of Europe is legion; for it was natural for the early settlers in the New world to wish to perpetuate here the memories of the communities in the Old world from which they had come.

While this was altogether proper, as long as America was composed of European colonies, we are not sure that its continuation today would be helpful. We have a feeling that the recent tendency to go back to native American place names is more useful in developing a consciousness in Americans that the United States is something more than an offshoot of Europe; that it is evolving, as generation follows generation, a distinctive individuality.—Detroit Free Press.

Character, Ability Need for Rhodes Scholarship

The founder of the Rhodes scholarship was Cecil John Rhodes, an Englishman, who left most of his wealth to provide scholarships at Oxford university for both Americans and Britons. These scholarships are for a period of three years each and are granted to persons between the ages of nineteen and twenty-five. Chief qualifications are scholastic ability and character.

Students are selected by committees of ex-Rhodes scholars, who judge the candidates by record and interview. Each year there are 34 students selected from Britain and her provinces and 32 from the United States and her possessions.

Marrying Younger

Americans are getting married at a younger age than in years gone by, according to the census bureau. In 1930 most men married at twenty-four and most women at twenty-one. Although comparable figures were not given, the bureau said marriage ages were much higher in 1890. The bureau did not speculate on the reason.

Air Service to China Will Force New Travel Concept

You can now buy an air ticket to carry you to the Orient. It will put you on board the "China Clipper" in San Francisco bay late in the afternoon. You will be settled in a comfortable compartment in time for dinner—dinner beneath a star-studded sky far above the highest clouds of the eastern Pacific. You will roll out of a larger-than pullman berth to thrill at the early morning sun splashing gold over Honolulu harbor.

Then on again, by daylight now, over a necklace of surf-ringed coral keys to the little Midway islands, where a well-appointed inn awaits your overnight stop. A short flight next day to Wake island, a tiny dot in the vast Pacific. There, too, you pass a night. Another daylight flight. A night on Guam. The next night finds you in exotic yet modern Manila. Then the following morning, you step ashore for luncheon, in China itself.—W. L. Van Dusen and Daniel Sayre in Cosmopolitan.

Influence Immortal

The men who are gone seem to have left behind them in the world much of their power of vitality; and I suppose hardly a day passes in which we do not do some act, small or great, under this power of inspiration of our predecessors, something we should not have done, or should have done differently, if, even with all the machinery of living and all the truths we know now, we had had no predecessors, had been the first tenants of our earth.—Phillips Brooks.

Don't Entrust Your Own or Your Family's Well-Being to Unknown Preparations

BEFORE you take any preparation you don't know all about, for the relief of headaches; or the pains of rheumatism, neuritis or neuralgia, ask your doctor what he thinks about it—in comparison with Genuine Bayer Aspirin.

We say this because, before the discovery of Bayer Aspirin, most so-called "pain" remedies were advised against by physicians as being bad for the stomach; or, often, for the heart. And the discovery of Bayer Aspirin largely changed medical practice.

Countless thousands of people who have taken Bayer Aspirin year in and out without ill effect, have proved that the medical findings about its safety were correct.

Remember this: Genuine Bayer Aspirin is rated among the fastest methods yet discovered for the relief of headaches and all common pains . . . and safe for the average person to take regularly.

You can get real Bayer Aspirin at any drug store—simply by never asking for it by the name "aspirin" alone, but always saying BAYER ASPIRIN when you buy.

CHRISTMAS
NEXT WEEK

MERRY CHRISTMAS

WHAT two words on human tongue are more heart-warming than those! They not only represent a friendly greeting, but in them are summed up the whole spirit of the Yuletide—brightness and laughter, joy of living and joy of giving, health and happiness, peace on earth and good will to all men.

It is a greeting which we will hear often in this community of ours during these happy days of the Christmas season. We will hear it on our streets, in our stores, along our country roads and in our homes. For ours is a friendly community and nowhere is that friendly greeting more sincere. It is not possible, however, for each of us to say "Merry Christmas!" to everyone and thus complete the happy circle of Yuletide good cheer.

But there is one who has that rare privilege, one who has been a welcome visitor at the firesides of the homes in this community throughout the year and who now claims the right to be the first to wish you joy at this joyous time. That one is your Home Paper.

So your Home Paper carries from you to all the community and from all the community to you this friendly greeting:

MERRY CHRISTMAS!

District Court Ended Wednesday; Taxpayers Protest To County Board

The District Court at Warren which has been in session more or less the past two months, was discontinued late Wednesday night.

Two Mud Lake cases have been tried during the past two weeks and the awards made by the jury in the first case was only $3.00 per acre for the land to the owner. The second case was a little better inasmuch as the award by the jury was for $5.50 per acre.

The first case was fought out over the old Benson farm and the second one was on some land adjoining the the Edwin Johnson farm on the north. Both tracts were 160 acre parcels and not only that but the second land was much poorer than the first and still it was awarded a higher price. The state and county lost money on both cases.

On Tuesday a very large delegation from Holt, Middle River, and Gatzke went to Warren and met with the County Board and protested against the Mud Lake project and the fact that the county was running in the hole on the whole thing by paying out good money in fighting the cases in connection with the state against the appallents.

According to information received from the County Auditors office yesterday morning, the county board had gone on record with a resolution protesting to the state as to the expense being cast upon the county and its taxpayers and if the state wishes to carry this farther they will have to stand the expense alone.

A lot of fine evidence was brought out at the meeting with the county board as to why the whole project should be droped and other ways be taken to settle the matter. Several of the farmers in the Mud Lake area who had up until Tuesday taken a stand in favor of the project, turned tables on the state after hearing the arguments and stated that they wished to have it droped. They also stated they would rather live in Mud Lake than any other place.

On Thursday of last week a delegation of buisness men and farmers from Holt, Middle River and Gatzke went to St. Paul and met with the State Conservation Commission. There it was argued that the project would not benifit the state as much as it would damage it through loss of taxes.

It was very unfortunate that the state could not get through the network with their pet scheme of having a few out in the area work so hard for them by being promised that they were going to be so well taken care off.

We could go ahead at this time and make it showy for some as to how much they really think of their community but we feel that if a fellow is led by high classed attorneys into making a mistake it will not undo it by giving him the rassberries.

Uses Christmas Seal Doll In Tuberculosis Talks

The march of tuberculosis events since the days of 1860, represented by the girl of this year's Christmas Seal, is being reviewed in a series of lectures throughout the state by Dr. Kathleen Jordan, speaker for the Minnesota Public Health Association. The doll pictured above was dressed by Doctor Jordan and is being used in all her talks.

"The girl of the 1860's never heard of tuberculosis," says Doctor Jordan, "but she knew about Consumption. She knew that it was a hopeless disease that sometimes took entire families and that no one knew its cause. Today we have sufficient knowledge to completely control the disease, and only one person is dying to three who died at the beginning of this century."

Dates of important events in the battle against tuberculosis since 1860 include: 1882, discovery of the germ that causes tuberculosis; 1885, establishment of the first sanatorium in the United States; 1895, discovery of the x-ray; 1904, Christmas Seal idea originated and the National Tuberculosis Association organized; 1907-08, tuberculin skin tests perfected; 1909, first preventorium established for children.

WASHINGTON DIGEST

National Topics Interpreted

BY WILLIAM BRUCKART

NATIONAL PRESS BLDG. WASHINGTON, D.C.

Big Problems Ahead

Washington.—Since it is only a few weeks until congress comes back to Washington for the second session of the Seventy-fourth congress, some of the problems which Persident Roosevelt must face have begun to take recognizable shape. There are any number of them, some great, some small, but that one which stands out at this writing involves the alignment shown between President Roosevelt and business interests.

It is a very interesting situation. Some weeks ago, the President promised business a "breathing spell." No one knew at that time how long this "breathing spell" was to last nor did anyone know exactly what it meant beyond the President's verbal statement that his New Deal program was virtually completed insofar as legislation was concerned. Through a combination of circumstances, the President's promise of a "breathing spell" for business has not only failed to placate business but at the same time has led to a determination on the part of business to go to bat with the New Deal. All of the information I have been able to gather indicates a distinct stiffening of resistance to the New Deal by all types of business interests, either corporate or individual.

There can be no doubt that a large segment of business is emphatic in its demand that New Deal spending be reduced. That section of the country's economic life is determined to force New Deal plans for spending back within the boundaries of what business interests hold to be reasonable. Having that determination, opponents of New Deal spending have at once something into which they can sink their teeth, namely, the annual government budget. In the nature of things, it and the President's annual message on the state of the Union go to congress in its first week of life. That means the country will hear at the very outset of the session something of Mr. Roosevelt's plans for further cash outlays.

The budget cannot be balanced in the next year. Consequently, the government debt, now above $30,000,000,000, will be further increased. It means, moreover, that before long there will have to be additional taxes. These increases in the tax levies probably will not come before the forthcoming session of congress but they cannot be much longer delayed because retirement of the gigantic debt is pressing even now.

The business viewpoint, of course, naturally is concerned most of all with potential tax increases. Business realizes that once the relief expenditures are cut down, common sense will demand revision of the tax structure in order that the vast amount of government bonds, notes and bills outstanding shall be liquidated in an orderly basis. So, in concentrating at this time on government spending, opponents of the New Deal actually are looking into the future and planning as far as they can to hold down the tax load they know they must carry sooner or later. It is quite obvious that there will be no change in the way of increased levies of taxes at the 1936 session of congress because, after all, political parties do not raise tax rates in an election year. But this government is due to continue as a government for this nation and the retirement of the $30,000,000,000 debt cannot be dodged.

Turns to Economy

From the White House and from Warm Springs, Ga., where the President lately took his annual Thanksgiving rest, there came announcements, both direct and inspired, that the President was turning to economy in the government outlay. The information, of an official character, indicated a desire on the part of the President to cut the ordinary expenditures of the government by $500,000,000 for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1936. The budget that will go to congress in the first week of January will cover the so-called ordinary expenses. On the surface it appears that this budget will aggregate about $4,000,000,000—just about the same as the budget for ordinary expenses of the government in the current 12-month period. But there has been no indication yet what the total of the extraordinary expenditures of the government will be.

We have, as you know, really two budgets. The ordinary budget is like the budget that has been used since the passage of the budget and accounting act in 1922. It covers the running expenses of all of the established governmental agencies, provides for all field work and carries appropriations for payment of interest on the government debt and a bite or two for retirement of outstanding bonds. The extraordinary expenditures under President Roosevelt's practices have been handled separately, being passed by congress in the form of a resolution for recovery and relief or some other such language making a lump appropriation.

It will be a matter then to which attention should be paid when the regular budget goes to congress and the President in his annual message gives some idea of what he proposes to spend for relief and recovery later on. The two must be taken together. Further, I believe if past practices are repeated, there will be White House requests for supplementary appropriations for the ordinary expenditures as well so that the total may not be disclosed for several months after congress meets.

Difficult Task

Under conditions that always have prevailed, the political party in power has always avoided tearing down bureaucracy in Washington in an election year. The civil lists of the government include most of the local politicians on whom the party in power must depend in its campaign for re-election. To remove many of them means naturally the loss of power in the local communities and no political party can hope to win by tearing down its campaign machinery in that manner.

Thus, Mr. Roosevelt's task appears difficult. He will be seeking economy in government outlays in an effort to satisfy and reassure business which is calling for economy. At the same time he is under the necessity of holding his political machine intact as the vehicle upon which he will seek to ride to re-election.

Besides this circumstance, there is the snarling and gnashing of business interests at the heels of the New Deal because business leaders contend the government is trying to run everything. Although the NRA is dead, there remain such things as the social security act which carries a tax on business pay rolls; the Guffey coal control law with its taxing powers, and the steady encroachment of government in business as is exemplified by the Tennessee Valley electric power project. It is no secret that business interests do not like any of these things and business has its heavy guns loaded to wreck the man who, by introducing the New Deal, must take responsibility for the government policies to which business objects.

Borah's Activity

Senator William E. Borah of Idaho has been much in the news lately. He is indulging in a sport, or a game, he takes up once each four years. The date of this activity always coincides each time with the maneuvering that precedes the selection of the Republican Presidential nominee.

Congress being in recess, very few sentors or Representatives are in Washington. When they are scattered to their homes, most of them rate very little publicity outside of their own bailiwicks. So, whether Senator Borah is in Washington or at his home in Idaho, he commands attention and hits the front page whenever he chooses to speak.

The current circumstances involving Senator Borah, therefore, are no different than those which surrounded him in previous periods when political discussions ran to Presidential nominees and party platforms, except that Senator Borah this time has commanded a little more attention and has been on the front pages with his statements to a greater extent than in previous years. This results from the situation in which the Republican party, being the minority party now, finds itself.

In the midst of all of this stands the figure, somewhat bulky, of Senator Borah. He has given every indication in the last several months: first, that he is not a candidate for the nomination; second, that he is a candidate for the nomination, and third, that he has not made up his mind. He has done all of these things well and no one knows whether he is a candidate or whether he is not a candidate or whether he has not made up his mind.

Having made quite clear that I am not informed as to Senator Borah's plans, I can fairly relate some of the things that have happened heretofore. I can recall for example that many times the Borah maneuvers have had as their objective the establishment of a political circumstance for the senator that has enabled him to exert unusual influence on the Republican national convention when it came time to write a party platform and select the party standard bearer. I believe it is fair to state that Senator Borah is a master tactician in this regard. I know that some of the old-line party wheelhorses fear him and his tactics immeasurably. I have seen evidences of that fear during the last several months and I have no doubt that there will be more of it displayed in the months to come.

Astute political observers around Washington contend that the senator's outward flirtation with the question of a Presidential candidacy is nothing more nor less than a repetition of what he has done before. They argue that Senator Borah wants to dominate the 1936 convention of the Republicans and he is laying the ground work to that end right now.

With the Minnesota Lawmakers

St. Paul—Relief problems and social security bills will be the order dished up to the special session of the state legislature for the next month, or maybe longer, as Governor Floyd B. Olson outlined the problems to be met. Majority leaders of both houses adopted resolutions calling for a session restricted to social security, relief and possibly minor changes in the tax laws. They took this action in the face of demands by farm and labor organizations for a program likely to keep them in session for months. By this action they hoped to rush the necessary legislation through by Christmas, although experienced veterans shook their heads over the likelihood.

Trouble over the old age pension problem appeared certain when the governor, in a statement at the opening of the session, came out in favor of a more liberal old age pension law which would cost an estimated $8,000,000 a year to the state. Taxes as a major item on the session agenda were definitely excluded by agreement of majority groups, who demonstrated at the opening session that they remained in control. But taxes for relief and pensions will be necessary, and one of the plans under consideration authorizes the city councils of Minneapolis, St. Paul and Duluth to levy a special sales tax to take care of the relief burden dropped by the federal government. A similar tax is now in effect in some larger cities.

Both houses went into session at noon December 2, and proceeded to organize with re-election of officials and employees who served at the regular session. In the lower house, the majority group re-elected Speaker George W. Johnson of Duluth over Harold H. Barker, Elbow Lake, liberal group nominee. Senate officers re-elected were G. Howard Spaeth, Ada, secretary; Howard Y. Torrey, Duluth, first assistant secretary; A. J. Loyear, Duluth, sergeant-at-arms; Van Lawrence, engrossing clerk; Orrin Shandorf, Faribault, enrolling clerk

"Only through state control and complete state financial obligation can we insure decent standards," the governor told the legislature in his opening address Tuesday. "I recommend a constitutional amendment empowering the state to pay pensions, funds which may be raised by taxes on payrolls." He stated that a great amount of property in Minnesota is escaping proper taxation, and advocated an increase in the money and credits tax from 3 to 6 mills. A state unemployment insurance law should provide for contributions only by employers and should be applicable to all employers of one or more employees, he said.

Rival bills on both the old age pension plan and the unemployment insurance problems came into the house. The majority bill on pensions was authored by Representative J. R. Swelzer of St. Paul, chairman of the special social security committe. Briefly, it provides that:

1—Old age pensions of not more than $30 a month shall be available to persons 65 and over who are United States citizens, have been residents of this country for 25 years and of the state of Minnesota at least five out of the 10 years preceding their application.

2—Inmates of state institutions, persons having relatives who should legally support them, and those owning property valued at more than $5,000 would be excluded from the pension-privileged group.

3—State and counties would both have a financial interest in the pension fund, the state paying 42½ per cent of the pensions, the counties 7½ per cent, and the federal government 50 per cent.

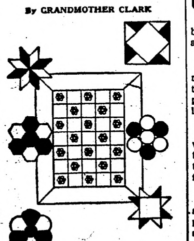
In submitting the administration proposal, Rep. Harold Barker, Elbow Lake, recommended $45 monthly pensions and $60 to married couples. This was the only major difference between the two bills.

On unemployment insurance, the two factions differed more widely, however. The majority bill, sponsored by Senator Donald O. Wright of Minneapolis, asks that employers pay 1 per cent of their 1936 pay rolls, 2 per cent of their 1937, and 3 per cent yearly thereafter into the insurance fund. Employees, under the plan, would pay .45 per cent of their wages in 1936, .9 per cent in 1937, and 1.35 per cent from then on. Senator G. T. Mullin's minority bill excluded the employees, stating that employers only should pay the same rates as fixed in the Wright measure.

Basing their demand on the claim that the law which went into effect last spring has proved a hardship to Minnesota farmers, a considerable faction of rural members asked a repeal of the tax exemption on household goods and farm machinery. The recent measure has increased taxes on livestock more than what has been offset in household exemptions, they asserted. One of two proposed corrective plans called for the outright repeal of the 1935 law, while the other advocated an increase in exemptions to $300

Inexpensive, Easy Patchwork Quilts

By GRANDMOTHER CLARK



Patchwork quilts as a rule are elaborate, cost quite a bit and represent many days of tedious work. This work and cost can be cut down to a minimum as shown in the illustration. Any of these designs can be used on eighteen nine-inch blocks and so arranged to make a full size quilt. About three ounces or one yard of prints is all that is required for the patchwork. Folder No. 536 in colors illustrates four ways to assemble these different designs, also cut out diagrams for six different patches like the picture. Information about yardage required for back, border and blocks is also given.

The folder No. 536 and folder No. 0 with other quilting information will be mailed upon receipt of 10 cents, or send us 19 cents and we will send folder and sufficient beautiful patches to make up the patchwork on one of these simple quilts.

Persistent Resistance to Temptation Proof

To resist temptation once is not a sufficient proof of honesty. If a servant, indeed, were to resist the continued temptation of silver lying in a window, as some people let it lie, when he is sure his master does not know how much there is of it he would give strong proof of honesty. But this is a proof to which you have no right to put a man. You know, humanly speaking, there is a degree of temptation which will overcome any virtue. Now, in as far as you approach temptation to a man, you do him an injury: and, if he is overcome, you share his guilt.—Doctor Johnson.

RANKS HIGH IN CLEANLINESS

Lanai was a cattle ranch 20 years ago, but today is noted for pheasants and pineapples. Sixth island in size in the Hawiian group, its Lanai City is called the most immaculately kept American municipality in all the islands. Roofs are painted in various colors, streets are shaded by Norfolk pines and yards glow with hibiscus blooms and flowering trees.

Mothers read this:
THREE STEPS TO RELIEVING CONSTIPATION

A cleansing dose today; a smaller quantity tomorrow; less each time, until bowels need no help at all.

The answer is simple, and it's the answer to all your bowel worries if you will only realize it: many doctors and hospitals use liquid laxatives.

Ask a doctor about this. Ask your druggist how very popular liquid laxatives have become. They give the right kind of help, and right amount of help. The liquid laxative generally used is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. It contains senna and cascara — both natural laxatives that can form no habit, even in children. So, try Syrup Pepsin. You just take regulated doses till Nature restores regularity.

Her cheek moved, touching his, until their lips came together in the gentle beginning of belief; and then the soft, near shadow of her husky whisper said, "Poor, dear darling—they haven't even let you"—she paused for the shadow of her soft chuckle too—"let you shave."

The exultance of laughter that ran from Hal's swelling lungs was a month of sunny convalescence crowded in one liquid moment; and he let her precious body free then, long enough to take away the hat that kept her hair from shining over this improbable return of all hope.

"Kind heaven!" he whispered. "My own dearest, don't you care what I've done? Are you taking me back out of the rotten, empty death I made for myself? Barry, you—"

"You've done nothing to me," she said against his speaking, her head nodding in a gentle negative: "except be all the things I want you to be—except make me love you." And her soft lips came back more closely.

Under his full, aspiring enchantment, brisk thoughts began to hurry about the means of preserving this miracle among its dark circumstances, to build up the sedulous patiences that must guard ecstasy forever now, against anything. He said carefully, unanxiously, "Barry, who knows where you are?"

Her head moved a little, and she said, "No one, my darling."

"You can stay hidden then—a little while—till I can get my discharge or sneak out of this d—n place, and we can get a boat for Japan, Australia, anywhere far away."

She made a quick exclamation, almost as of pity; both her hands came to his cheeks in a more precious cherishing of him; and as her head moved back, he saw tears come to the sudden wonder of her eyes.

"You would," she said in marveling softness, "You'd do that for me." There was reverence, an awed humility in her slow kiss. Then she raised her head again to watch his eyes, and she said, "I didn't kill him."

"No," she said in dreaming gentleness, "I didn't kill him. I didn't have to."

"Kerrigan!" said Hal with swift conviction, swift remorse at having forgotten him till now. "They haven't caught him," he stated slowly.

"No," she said. "And they won't. He's gone somewhere: he wouldn't tell me. I said good-by to him last night. I've got a letter for you from him."

He moved his fingers over her smooth brows, down the sure modeling of her cheek to the full, honorable lips. And all the time her tender eyes watched him as if he were the thing so difficult to believe in all this.

Inside Kerrigan's long fat envelope were his letter, four or five telegrams, and a folded document. Hal went first to the letter:

"Sport,

"Besides my ambition to kill a man in the cool of the blood (which is satisfied and cured, let me tell you), I've wanted to play god to people I loved. It isn't going to be so very godlike unless I get away with it. It was tough standing you in the corner so long. But the thing was no soap unless it embodied the latest aerodynamic principles. There wasn't much time to read up on those during our slight buggy ride of the other night; and I had a h—l of a time getting your girl's unconditioned promise to go straight to you—before the fireworks.

"The police get my confession today, as near a perfect example of the confessor's art as an old legal friend can make it. You're left out of everything entirely. They'll have to see Barry, I guess, but she knows her story (you'd be surprised how tough it is sometimes to whip the truth into plausibility). The thing may not be watertight, so I'll be watching in the bushes till it's over; and if anything blows up, I'll take care of it. You stay out of it. For Barry's sake, your father's, mine, anybody's. Do me that one holy favor, Hal. Don't go chivalrous on us. It would wreck the works.

"Enclosed please find documents, which hide under some lonely cobblestone till everything's in the bag, then burn. Here are telegrams about who you are and aren't, and that incrimination the late Martin Crack got from Barry's father.

"Do this for me too, sport, will you? The first three days of the next month after it's all over, run a Personal in the Chicago Tribune, addressed 'Colonel,' saying you're married, what town you're living in, and whether your father's N. Y. bank is a good place to write you congratulations.

"Some day we'll hoist a couple more, and I'll tell the kids about Wyoming. Hasta la vista; and good luck, you lucky guy: but always be sure there's one old railroad man who believes you rate it. K."

Hal looked up at Barry when he had finished. And quietly she explained: "He killed him, Hal, and then he went down to the street and stood there for an hour—to keep me from going in. It had taken me so long to—to find my courage."

Her head was up, the grace of its carriage unoppressed by anything that had happened or nearly happened, invulnerable to shame and fear and remorse because the bravery behind her eyes could not invite those things. The beauty of her face was so simply, so wonderfully arrived at: the white, straight nose; the faint indrawing of her smooth cheeks that seemed to make her untouched lips push a very little forward; the clear candor of her eyes that wanted to show him anything he should desire; the direct curve of eyebrows and the white forehead; the rich, parted flow of gold so simply ended in the thick upturnings at her neck. Whether it was more painfully beautiful to believe in the possession of her or to believe her a dream, Hal couldn't tell. He knew he would risk nothing of that beauty again—ever, in the smallest way. It might still be the boat for Australia. And in the meantime, in case the police—

"Barry," Hal said in the crispness of immediate necessity, "the first thing you've got to do—"

Her cool hand came against his mouth. "The first thing—" she said, her quiet voice near huskiness, her clear eyes untouched by his concern: "more important than any old unshaven thought of yours—" She bent over in quick, supple grace and whispered at his ear, "Hal, do you love me?"

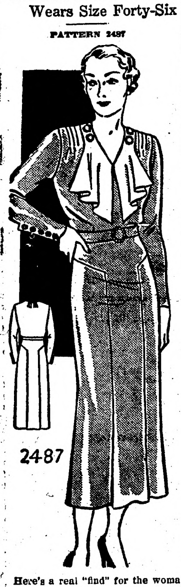
PATTERN 2487



Here's a real "find" for the woman who's a size forty-six, and has been seeking a dressy frock that will ably conceal extra pounds, yet allow her to look as young as she feels. Then, too, there's also a wealth of slenderness to be gained by center panels, front and back, which hold a wide box pleat in seam. Deserving of the title "bosom friend" is that dressy, graceful twin jabot that so successfully conceals too ample curves. The matron will do well to choose a smooth, sleek silk, satin, or crepe for her "very best" frock, let the jabot contrast, and bright buttons do a little "highlighting."

Pattern 2487 is available in sizes 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46. Size 36 takes 3½ yards 39 inch fabric and ⅞ yard contrasting. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

Pigs Ain't Pigs

"Pigs is pigs, maybe," observed Farmer Julian Brown of Kinston, N. C., "but mine ain't." His pigs, Brown said, "regard cleanliness next to godliness." That is why he rigged up a shower bath for the sow and her litter of six. "The pigs keep sleek and clean," he said, "and enjoy the shower immensely."

That Touch of Madness Which We Call Genius

The word "genius" has fallen into disrepute during late years, for if a man builds a better mousetrap than his neighbor, breeds a better heifer, sits an hour longer on a steeple or paints a more unintelligible picture—we hail him as a "genius."

To be a genius, it is not enough to produce a technically perfect piece of work. It must be something which is above being technically perfect, something to which has been lent for the moment a touch of the supernormal. Mental, physical and spiritual qualities working in harmony can achieve a technically perfect product. If, to these qualities, there is added another element which one can perceive but cannot understand—then we have, in truth, a work of genius.

Even in the world of sports, where sheer physical superiority wins eighty times out of a hundred, we come across performances which make us cry loud in wonder. We know they are humanly impossible and we can only believe that for the moment the artist has been touched with the tincture of madness.—Quentin Reynolds in Cosmopolitan.

Smiles

A FRESH ONE

A college professor and his wife entertained at dinner a few weeks ago. In the midst of the gayety at the table a child's voice was heard coming from the floor above.

"Mother!"

"What is it, Archie?" she asked.

"There's only clean towels in the bathroom. Shall I start one?"

Hardly!

"My dear," said the professor's wife, "a truck ran over your best hat."

"Really?" answered the professor. "Was I wearing it?"

Interference

"Are you still writing profound articles?" asked the lady with a roll of manuscript.

"No," answered Miss Cayenne, "I found it interfered with my more serious duties. You can't spill ink and pour tea simultaneously."

Child Will Read Story That He Thinks Is Good

"Who shall define interest for another person, compounded as it is of the raw material of which personality is made?" queries a writer in the Parents' Magazine, declaring that there is apt to be one of two reasons why a child does not like to read. Either he has not mastered the technique of reading to an extent where no voluntary effort must be exerted or else he has not had access in sufficient numbers to books which correspond to his idea of a good story.

"Your child will read if he but discovers the books particularly right for his interests and tastes," declares the writer whose experiences with children and books has convinced her that there does not live the youngster who will not listen to a good story, and since reading is only a method of listening to a good story, will not read if the book is about something in which he is either actually or potentially interested; is written in words and style suitable to his reading ability; has the degree of advancement suitable to both his emotional and intellectual age levels. Those two developments, by the way, are at entirely different rates of speed. As the writer adroitly puts it: "Children do the strangest juggling and somersaulting as regards these ages, going into a handspring a poised adolescent, coming up at the end, an emotional eight-year-old."

Cheers for Calumet's New 10¢ Can—and perfect, never-fail baking!

"I never have baking troubles with Calumet—and I save, too!" says Mrs. Jack Caskey, 880 Avalon St., Memphis, Tenn.

"Your new 10c can makes me feel very thrifty!" says Mrs. Nancy E. Williams, 499 Moreland Ave., Atlanta, Ga.

"It's real quality at a saving!" says Mrs. K. J. Tobin, of Beverly Hills, Ill. "I've never had a baking failure with Calumet."

Why does Calumet give such "luck"? Why is it different from other baking powders?

Calumet combines two distinct leavening actions. A quick one for the mixing bowl—a slower one for the oven. This Double-Action is so perfectly balanced and controlled that it produces perfect leavening. Calumet is a product of General Foods.

All Calumet prices are lower! Calumet is now selling at the lowest prices in its history...The regular price of the Full-Pound Can is now only 25c! And ask to see the new, big 10c can—a lot of good baking for a dime—with Calumet, the Double-Acting Baking Powder.

Senator Thomas D. Schall Dies; Was Struck By Auto

Thomas D. Schall, Minnesota's Junior U. S. Senator, died in Washington Sunday morning from injuries sustained when struck by an automobile as he was crossing a street late last week. Funeral services will be held in Minneapolis on Thursday for the colorful blind Minnesota senator. Senator Schall has been one of the most bitter foes of President Roosevelt and the New Deal and was to be opposed in the general election next fall by governor Floyd B. Olson, who has announced that he will seek the senatorship. The Governor stated Monday that he would fill the vacancy for the unexpired term by apointment of a Farmer-Laborite and that he would not resign the governorship to receive the apointment. The Governor expects to name the new senator in a few days.

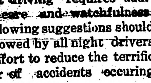
Continue Appeals To Feb. 10; No Reports On Resolutions

Appeals in the Mud Lakel condemnation proceedings were adjourned until February 10 following completion of the trial of two cases here last week, the present jury being dismissed Thursday morning by Judge J. E. Montague, who presided during the trial, according to A. C. Swandby, clerk of court.

In the second case which was completed late last Wednesday afternoon a verdict in the sum of $880.00 for the appalent was awarded by the jury for a quarter section of land contained in the project. This was considered as distinct victory for the appallents.

No reports have been received here regarding the resolutions adopted by the County Board of Commissioners in session here last Tuesday when stringent resolutions urging either settlement of the cases or abandonment of the project were forwarded to the Minnesota Conservation Commission. The county commissioners cited the excessive costs of court proceedings and also that the awards of the viewers were unjust.—Warren Sheaf.



Night driving requires additional care and watchfulness. The following suggestions should be followed by all night drivers in an effort to reduce the terrific number of accidents occuring after sundown.

1. Never stop on, or near a blind curve.
2. Never stop just beyond the crest of a hill.
3. If the shoulder of a highway will support the weight of your vehicle, get as far off the pavement as possible before stopping.
4. Leave all lights on vehicle burning.

6. If you are obliged to stop on the pavement the first thing to do is to get behind your vehicle with a light and signal following cars. It is the first few seconds after stopping that most of the serious crashes occur. Stand at least 100 feet behind the vehicle and wave a flashlight or lantern.
7. If you have fuses or flares with you, light them at once. Put one 200 feet behind your car, one at 200 feet ahead, and, unless your truck is carrying flamable materials, put one alongside
8. Move your car to a safer place as quickly as possible.

J. W. Taylor To Mud Lake Project At Thief River Falls

According to the following item clipped from the Baudette Region, the Government is still interested in rehabilitation work in this community.

Early this week J. W. Taylor, project manager of the Beltrami Island forest area in Lake of the Woods county, accepted a similar position as project manager of the Mud Lake area near Thief River Falls. He will be succeeded here by Christian Nash, who has been his assistant. The new position comes as a promotion with additional pay for Mr. Taylor. He had been offered a position as district manager of WPA projects with headquarters at Detroit Lakes, but finally decided to take the Mud Lake position. His headquaters will be at Thief River Falls, and he will take charge of the new position January first.—Baudette Region.

Editors Note: We are sorry to see that Mr. Taylor should have to go to Thief River falls to help rehabilitate Mud Lake farmers who, in the first place are putting up a hard fight to remain where they are, and, that Mr. Noonan of the Region is actually stating in the above item that the Mud Lake area is near Thief River Falls. We feel sorry for the Mud Lake people who, will if this fooling around with them keeps on, spend more to find out why they have to leave their present homes, and where they are going then, they will get if they should be lucky enough to get anything when it is all settled.

At the present time the people in Mud Lake are in the same fix of the man who was set adrift in a small boat. When he woke up after his first night out in the dark (the way you have been kept for about two years concerning this project) he exclaimed, "Who am I! Where am I! And why am I!"

Life Of Mrs. Hans Furr Pioneer Settler At Holt

Mrs. Hans Furr was born in Klabo, near Trondhjem, Norway on Oct. 4, 1861. Her parents were John and Else Osen. She came to America in the year of 1882 and settled at Warren, Minn., and was married that same year to Hans Furr.

She resided in Warren for 3 years. From there she went Comstock Township where she made her home for ten years. From there she moved to East Valley Township and settled on a homestead where she resided until her death.

Mr. Furr and two daughters preceeded her in death. Mr. Furr passing away on April 29, 1911.

In the last few years of her life Mrs. Furr's health had been failing gradually. She became seriously ill on November 30th and, on December 6th she was taken to the St. Lukes hospital at Thief River Falls where she passed away the same day at 10:30 in the evening.

Cause of her death was heart failure and other complications. She was 74 years, 2 months and two days old.

She leaves to mourn her loss, two sons ond five daughters. They are: Mrs. Knut Swenson of Bergland, Ontario, Canada; Mrs. Leonard Johnson and Mrs. A. M. Johnson of Thief River Falls; Mrs. O. M. Larson and Mrs. Laura Fredrickson, Edward and Oscar of Holt. She also leaves three sisters, Mrs. Sigrid Ofstad of Trondhjem, Norway, Miss Else and Beret Osen, who live on the old home place in Norway; also 15 grandchildren and two great grandchildren.

She was a kind, considerate and loving mother and has surely done her share in the making of Marshall County.

She was an active member of the Nazareth Lutheran Church and Ladies' Aid until her death.

Mr. and Mrs. David Johnson and daughter Rosemond came here Sunday and returned to Fargo Monday.

FIVE Meals a Day!

Or Why Cooks Leave Home

SHALL we eat three meals a day —or five? Is there any particular reason why, for years, we have accepted three, rather than four or five as the correct number of daily meals? On what number of meals is human efficiency highest?

These are some of the questions which Howard W. Haggard and Leon A. Greenberg seek to answer in their new book, "Diet and Physical Efficiency." They are questions which will be worth the consideration of housewives whose task it is to keep modern families fit.

Worth Considering

The authors maintain that the conventional arrangement of three meals per day is not determined solely, or even chiefly, for the greatest nutritional advantage. Breakfast is a light meal because it requires that someone should get up early to prepare it; the evening meal is eaten fairly early so that someone does not have to work late to wash dishes. The factory worker eats light lunch at noon while the farm laborer eats his dinner at noon—partly because the farmer's wife likes to get her work out of the way in the morning hours.

Yet, this volume points out, a household often includes young, middle aged and aged people whose nutritional needs are widely different. By checking up the industrial output of factory operatives, the authors found that as much as 10 per cent greater efficiency was achieved by a change from three meals a day to five, with no alteration in the total amount of food eaten, and this plan abolished a fall in production in the late hours of the morning and afternoon.

But how about cooking five meals a day, the housewife will ask? Canners have provided a modern means of preparing satisfactory and delicious meals. It is as simple today to prepare five good meals as it was, years ago, to prepare three—simpler perhaps. Nourishing canned soups, delicious canned meats, vegetables, ingredients for salads, specialties, beverages and desserts greatly simplify modern meal preparing. Perhaps you'll try it!

GREETINGS

By WILLIAM BRUCKART

Political Problems

Washington.—A politician without a problem confronting him is virtually unknown. Whether he be a big shot in political life or just a ward heeler, his life is constantly beset with difficulties. Those difficulties always have and always will force him to wiggle and squirm and sprout additional gray hairs.

The newest problem worrying politicians is the Townsend old age pension proposal. Promoters of that fantastic scheme are gaining such a headway that even James A. Farley, postmaster general, chairman of the Democratic national committee and chairman of the New York state Democratic committee, is currently reported to be developing frowns on his otherwise smiling face. When Mr. Farley begins to get worried, there is cause, indeed, for all of the other politicians, big and little, to get worried. The Republicans also are concerned about the Townsend plan. But it is not quite as important to the Republicans as it is to the Democrats to take a stand on the Townsend plan because the Democrats are in control of the national administration and obviously they are on the defensive.

The battle being pressed by Mr. Townsend and his satellites is no small concern. Impossible as it is of operation; doomed to ultimate failure as such a scheme must definitely be, it continues to expand in its scope of political influence and has arrived at the point where it constitutes a power that must be reckoned with by all.

I am convinced that anyone who will analyze the Townsend plan cannot help arriving at the conclusion that it is comparable to the fantasy of the "Mississippi bubble." When the Mississippi bubble broke, not thousands but millions were disillusioned, if not utterly destroyed, and their economic future, so glowingly painted, was completely wrecked.

* * *

Townsend Plan

The Townsend plan which contemplates payment of two hundred dollars per month to the indigent is one of those things that develops invariably in periods of economic distress. It is distinctly a product of hard times.

When people are out of work and without resources; when they are suffering, they are always prey to any and all argument offering them relief. The conditions exact even a greater toll, a toll leading to crime. Only a few days ago the chief of the secret service, W. H. Moran, told me that it was a characteristic of hard times that counterfeiters of currency were more active. Idle hands will find something to do and the clever crook will take advantage of the situation. While every one who has talked with Doctor Townsend recognizes his sincerity, his earnest desire to accomplish relief for the aged and indigent population, I believe it is an indisputable fact that Doctor Townsend's plan would not get to first base except for the fact that this country now has millions of citizens who are almost if not quite without food.

The point I am trying to make is that Doctor Townsend's scheme, idle dream that it is, has been put forward at one of the few times in this nation's history when it is possible to amass a following of political importance. It is only in times such as these that people would pay attention to it. It will die down and his organization will crumble sometime in the future but this will not happen until it has caused plenty of grief, until it has wrecked political fortunes of countless scores of men and women who guess wrong and until probably it has produced a burden of taxation upon this nation the like of which never has been seen before.

In the forthcoming campaign, I believe we will see numerous political candidates, otherwise sound in their thinking, affirm the validity of the Townsend plan. They will commit themselves to its support because political maneuvers will force them into that position. Some of them, probably more than we now imagine, will be elected to congress and they will bring a gigantic headache to Uncle Sam who must foot the bill.

Townsend plan supporters in all of their preachments have consistently talked of their proposition from its beauteous side. It is susceptible of that because it is easy to point out what a blessing it would be to have each aged person receive a monthly check of two hundred dollars from the government.

But there is another side to the picture. It is basic. Where will the government get the money? Townsend spokesmen have figured out a visionary taxation scheme to raise the amount of money required but the thing they do not discuss is the fundamental fact that by their taxation scheme they will depreciate our national currency and will load upon those who are willing to work such a burden of taxation that soon there will be a clamor from three out of four of the population for some kind of a government payment. The end then would be obvious because after all government as such produces nothing. All that it pays out must be taken from those who produce.

Another Problem

In adverting to the Townsend plan as I have done, I have attempted to set forth in a manner what I believe to be one of the greatest dangers of the present day, namely, the absence of clear thinking. In the Townsend plan, as in many other problems that confront the nation at the moment, individuals seem prone to jump at conclusions without analyzing what conditions actually are and without considering what the ultimate effect would be.

It seems worth while to consider another national problem which, though of an economic nature and less sensational in its outward appearance, is nevertheless very real. This problem concerns our transportation system.

Shortly after President Roosevelt took office we were deluged with argument that amounted to propaganda favoring government ownership of the railroads. There was a reaction against this idea. The reaction was so strong that few politicians dared to unloose their demagogery in favor of government ownership. Yet, it is perfectly evident that those who favor perpetuating private enterprise which is always more efficient and less wasteful than any government are in danger of being lulled to sleep. Crack pots and misguided theorists in great numbers still favor government ownership of the railroads. They are still working. The government ownership problem is not dead. It is only concealed from the eyes of most of us for the time being.

Certain developments of the past several months confirm the statement I have just made. Taken singly, these developments appear insignificant. Collectively, they are very important.

I have heard it charged that government ownership advocates have a well-laid plan to wreck private ownership in the rail industry. This charge goes further. It asserts that those who seek to destroy our profit system are proceeding, piecemeal, to load a burden of charges upon the railroads so that in the end it will be a physical impossibility for the railroad corporations to earn a profit. Indeed, it is alleged that the scheme contemplates eventual burdening of the rail lines to the extent where they cannot make their expenses.

* * *

Means Bankruptcy

Obviously, if that end were attained, bankruptcy would follow. Then, there would be no alternative but legislative action placing the railroads in government ownership. Our wartime experience ought to be sufficient to demonstrate how the costs mount when the government operates the railroads. It means more taxes on every one of us who has income whether it be large or small.

But to get back to the developments mentioned earlier. Whether there exists an actual plan to drive the railroads into bankruptcy or not, the developments certainly are subject to that surmise. One of the items of expense, a new burden of cost that is proposed to be loaded on the railroads, is the rail pension law. I have seen some statistical calculations which were convincing to me at least that the charges proposed to be levied upon the railroads by the law will not work out in the manner their proponents claim. The bill would assess each rail corporation 3½ per cent of its payroll and each worker would contribute a proportionate amount of his salary toward his pension when he retires. Like the Townsend plan, no one can argue against the fine spirit actuating a move to protect the retired workers. But to go behind the figures at the start one finds certain astonishing facts. Almost any way, almost any method, one uses to calculate this cost, forces the conclusion that after eight or ten years the pension system will have expanded to such an extent that the railroads will be carrying an annual charge on their payroll of not 3½ per cent but approximately 15 per cent. I think it goes without saying that no industry can bear such a tax.

In addition to the pension proposition, labor unions, aided by their cats'-paws in congress have kept up a steady machine gun fire, demanding first one thing and then another from the carriers. For instance, one of the current demands—and it is likely to succeed in some form—is the movement for shorter hours for practically the entire list of railroad employees. Of course, the railroads cannot justify working their employees longer than eight hours except in an emergency. It is possible that a seven-hour day might be practiced. But even a seven-hour day would mean that the railroads must add to their operating costs, and any item added to operating costs reduces the chance of the corporations for an even break between income and outgo.

There are a number of other such demands or movements under way or in the offing. Each one means a new burden, a new tax on the railroads.

With the Minnesota Lawmakers

In an effort to get an old age pension bill on the law books before Christmas, state legislators knuckled down to the business of drafting a measure designed to include the best features of conflicting proposals so far laid before them. To expedite the task, the house appointed a special committee headed by Representative George MacKinnon of Minneapolis. Other members are Representatives M. F. Ettel of St. Paul, George W. Champlin of Lake Crystal, T. S. Slen of Madison, Marcus Nelson of Tamarack and R. G. Johnson of Forest Lake, who is chairman of the public welfare committee.

Representative MacKinnon called his group into immediate action and advised them to remain at the capitol over the week-end to get a bill to the house within the first three or four days of the new week. Despite controversial opinion on the amount of the monthly pensions, the beginning age and administrative problem, Representative MacKinnon said difficulties can be ironed out for final approval on the floor.

While preparations were being rushed for enactment of the old age pension bill, indications were that unemployment insurance will be a long time getting on the statute books. Legislative leaders indicated there will be a long adjournment over the holidays, beginning December 20 and probably ending in the middle of January. There was no disposition to rush back after the holidays unless the relief situation requires immediate attention.

Meanwhile there is a strong disposition in both houses to let the unemployment insurance bill go until the 1937 regular session, although many leaders insist that some sort of measure should be passed simply to assure the state protection under provisions of the federal social security law. The state law, it was explained, could be so drafted that it would become inoperative should the supreme court nullify the federal act.

With an approval of the demand for the repeal of the 1935 law which dropped levies against personal property but increased them on livestock, the house tax committee let down the first barriers in the rural legislators' fight for a restoration of the personal property tax on household goods.

In presenting their case to the committee, rural legislators said that farmers throughout Minnesota are demanding a restoration of the old status, which exempted $100 of household goods, farm machinery, and livestock from the levies. The low $25 exemption on the machinery and livestock items the advocates declared, has more than made up the difference of what the agriculturist has saved on household goods.

Estimating that the administration of the old age pension law and its adjuncts will cost $608,500 during the next year, Mrs. Blanche la Du, chairman of the state control board, told joint committees of the two houses that her board will seek to administer the law through county welfare boards.

The rural credits body of the senate decided not to request the rules committee to recommend consideration of a bill designed to expedite liquidation of the state rural credits department. They agreed, however, to confer with Theodore Arens, conservator of the department, concerning rural credits problems, and set 1 p. m. on December 19 for a meeting with farmers holding rural credit loans.

Shocked by the brutal murder of Walter Liggett, crusading Minneapolis publisher of the Mid-West American, legislators planned action along two lines after copies of the last issue of Liggett's paper had been placed on their desks.

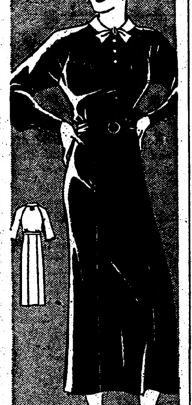
One move was for the appropriation of $2,500 as a reward for the apprehension and conviction of the killer or killers. Several legislators hinted that they would introduce such a bill, and it was understood that Gov. Olson would sign the measure, if passed. Conservative senators were considering requesting an appropriation up to $50,000 for a state-sponsored investigation of underworld activities in Minnesota, particularly in and about Minneapolis.

Senator Tungseth has resumed his campaign to force refinancing of $25,000,000 of rural credit bonds now held in state trust funds, which so far has been held up by State Treasurer, Julius A. Schmahl.

An attack on educational institutions owning tax exempt income property was launched by Rep. R. J. Julkowski, Minneapolis, who introduced a bill authorizing submission of a proposed constitutional amendment at the next election. Adoption of the amendment would pave the way for the levying of real estate taxes on such property now owned by colleges, universities, and schools. Rep. Julkowski's proposal recalled the Pillsbury academy case which aroused great controversy in the regular session last year.

A Dressy Frock Fitting Budget

PATTERN 9545



"As easy as pie" to fit between two graceful raglan sleeves, a wedge-shaped yoke is a distinguishing feature of this rather dressy, yet inexpensive afternoon frock. You'll find it hard to decide which sleeve treatment is the more charming, the one that tapers to a snugly buttoned cuff, or the one which stops just short of the wrist. Don't forget to note the very new, gored skirt with its subtle flare. If it's a dressy dress you want, black satin is ideal; but if you're out for color, choose a richly hued novelty synthetic.

Pattern 9545 may be ordered only in sizes 14, 16, 18, 20, 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42. Size 16 requires 3½ yards 39 inch fabric and ⅝ yard contrasting. Complete diagrammed sew chart included.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, STYLE NUMBER and SIZE.

PANAMA CANAL NOT JUST MERE DITCH: A SECOND-STORY LAKE

The Panama canal is of tremendous importance, for it makes it possible for us to have one navy instead of two. The excellent way in which the locks are handled lets us move the whole of our fleet from the Atlantic into the Pacific, or vice versa, in a day and a half. And, furthermore, from a purely engineering angle this canal is more vulnerable than most.

It is not (as so many people still seem to believe) a big ditch dug across the narrow strip of mountainous land that connects North and South America. It is really a second-story lake that carries the ships from one ocean to the next by way of the attic. Instead of digging a deep ditch across the isthmus, our engineers dammed up two small rivers and created two vast artificial lakes. They then cut through the narrow mountain ridge that separated these two lakes and constructed a number of gigantic locks which carry the vessels from the Atlantic tidewaters to the artificial lake, away up high between the mountains, and which drop them just as gently when the time has come for them to go back to the other sea.

A canal like that depends for its efficiency upon its locks. Once one of the locks has been destroyed or even seriously damaged, the canal is as helpless as an automobile without gasoline.—Hendrick Willem Van Loon in Cosmopolitan.

SHIFTING SANDS

By Sara Ware Bassett

CHAPTER I

Just why she should have been singled out by this significant sobriquet was a subtle psychological problem. There were other women in Belleport and in Wilton, too, who had lost husbands. Nevertheless, despite the various homes in which solitary women reigned, none of their owners was designated by the appellation allotted to Marcia Howe.

Moreover, there seemed in the name the hamlet had elected to bestow upon her a ring of satisfaction, even of rejoicing, rather than the note of condolence commonly echoing in the term. Persons rolled it on their tongues as if flaunting it triumphantly on the breeze.

"Marcia ought never to have married Jason Howe," asserted Abbie Brewster when one day she reminiscently gossiped with her friend, Rebecca Gill. "She was head an' shoulders above him. Whatever coaxed her into it I never could understand. She could have had her pick of half a dozen husbands."

"She was nothin' but a slip of a thing when she married. Mebbe she had the notion she could reform him," Rebecca suggested.

"Mebbe," agreed Abbie. "Still, young as she was, she might 'a' known she couldn't. Ten years ago he was the same, unsteady, drinkin' idler he proved himself to be up to the last minute of his life. He hadn't changed a hair. Such men seldom do, unless they set out to; an' Jason Howe never set out to do, or be, anything. He was too selfish an' to lazy. Well, he's gone, an' Marcia's well rid of him. For 'most three years now, she's been her own mistress an' the feelin' that she is must be highly enjoyable."

"S'pose she'll always go on livin' there on that deserted strip of sand?" speculated Rebecca. "Why, it's 'most an island. In fact, it is an island at high tide."

"So 'tis. An' Zenas Henry says it's getting to be more an' more so every minute," Abbie replied. "The tide runs through that channel swift as a race horse an' each day it cuts a wider path 'twixt Marcia an' the shore. Before long, she's goin' to be as completely cut off from the mainland at low water as at high."

"It must be a terrible lonely place."

"I wouldn't want to live there," shrugged the sociable Abbie. "But there's folks that don't seem to mind solitude, an' Marcia Howe's one of 'em. Mebbe, after the life she led with Jason, she kinder relishes bein' alone. Furthermore, dynamite couldn't blast her out of that old Daniels homestead. Her father an' her grandfather were born there an' the house is the apple of her eye. It is a fine old place if only it stood somewheres else. Of course, when it was built the ocean hadn't et away the beach, an' who'd 'a' foreseen the tides would wash 'round it 'til they'd whittled it down to little more'n a sand bar, an' as good as detached it from the coast altogether?"

"Well, say what you will against the sea an' the sand, they did a good turn for Marcia all them years of her married life. At least they helped her keep track of Jason. Once she got him on the Point with the tide runnin' strong 'twixt him and the village, she'd padlock the skiff an' there he'd be! She had him safe an' sound," Abbie chuckled.

"Yes," acquiesced Rebecca. "But the scheme worked both ways. Let Jason walk over to town across the flats an' then let the tide rise an' there he be, too! Without a boat there was no earthly way of his gettin' home. He had the best of excuses for loiterin' an' carousin' ashore."

"Well, he don't loiter and carouse here no longer. Marcia knows where he is now," declared Abbie with spirit. "I reckon she's slept more durin' these last three years than ever she slept in the ten that went before 'em. She certainly looks it. All her worries seem to have fallen away from her, leavin' her lookin' like a girl of twenty. She's pretty as a picture."

"She must be thirty-five if she's a day," Rebecca reflected.

"She ain't. She's scarce over thirty. But thirty or even more, she don't look her age."

"Marry? There you go, 'Becca, romancin' as usual."

"I ain't romancin'. I was just wonderin'. An' I ain't the only person in town askin' the question, neither," retorted Mrs. Gill with a sniff. "There's scores of others. In fact, I figger the thought is the uppermost one in the minds of 'most everybody."

Abbie laughed.

"Mebbe. In fact, I reckon 'tis," conceded she. "It's the thought that come to everyone quick as Jason was buried. Folks 'round about here are fond of Marcia an' feel she's been cheated out of what was her rightful due. They want her to begin anew an' have what she'd oughter have had years ago—a good husband an' half a dozen children. I ain't denyin' there are certain persons who are more self-seekin'. I ain't blind to the fact that once Jason was under the sod, 'bout every widower in town sorter spruced up an' began to take notice; an' before a week was out every bachelor had bought a new necktie."

"Abbie!"

"It's true. An' why, pray, shouldn't the men cast sheep's eyes at Marcia? Can you blame 'em? She'd be one wife in a hundred could a body win her. There ain't a thing she can't do from shinglin' a barn down to trimmin' a hat. She's the match of any old salt at sailin' a boat an' can pull an oar strong as the best of 'em. Along with that she can sew, cook, an' mend; plow an' plant; paper a room. It's a marvel to me how she's kept out of matrimony long's this with so many men millerin' 'round her."

"She certainly's takin' her time. She don't 'pear to be in no hurry to get a husband," smiled Rebecca.

"Why should she be? Her parents left her with money in the bank an' the Homestead to boot, an' Marcia was smart enough not to let Jason make ducks and drakes of her property."

"Any man Marcia Howe married would have to put up with it," Abbie asserted, biting off a needleful of thread with a snap of her fine white teeth. "Marcia's always been captain of the ship an' she always will be."

A scuffling on the steps, the kitchen door swung open and Zenas Henry's lanky form appeared on the threshold. Behind him tagged his crony, Lemuel Gill.

"Well, well, 'Becca, if here ain't Lemmy come to fetch you!" Abbie cried. "'Fraid your wife had deserted you, Lemmy? She ain't. She was just this minute settin' out for home."

"I warn't worryin' none," grinned Lemuel.

"What you two been doin'?" Abbie inquired of her husband.

"Oh, nothin' much," answered the big, loose-jointed fellow, shuffling into the room. "We've been settin' out, drinkin' in the air."

The carelessness of the reply was a trifle overdone, and instantly aroused the keen-eyed Abbie's suspicions.

"Where you been settin'?" she demanded.

"Settin'? Oh, Lemmy an' me took sort of a little jaunt along the shore. Grand day to be abroad. I never saw a finer. The sea's blue as a corn-flower, an' the waves are rollin' in, an' rollin' in, an'—"

Lemuel Gill stepped into the breach.

"'Twas this way," began he. "Zenas Henry an' me thought we'd take a bit of a meander. We'd been to the post office an' was standin' in the doorway when we spied Charlie Eldridge goin' by with a fish-pole—"

"Charlie Eldridge—the bank cashier?" Rebecca echoed. "But he ain't no fisherman. I never in all my life knew of Charlie Eldridge goin' a-fishin'. Not that he ain't got a perfect right to fish if he wants to outside bankin' hours. But—"

"But Charlie fishin'!" interrupted Abbie, cutting her friend short. "Why, he'd no more dirty his lily-white hands puttin' a squirmin' worm on a fish-hook than he'd cut off his head. In fact, I don't believe he'd know how. You didn't, likely, see where he went."

"Wal—er—yes. We did."

Zenas Henry wheeled about.

"Havin' completed the business that took us to the store—" he began.

"Havin' in short, asked for the mail an' found there warn't none," laughed Abbie, mischievously.

Zenas Henry ignored the comment.

"We walked along in Charlie's wake," he continued.

"Wal, Charlie swung along, kinder whistlin' to himself, 'til he come to the fork of the road. Then he made for the shore."

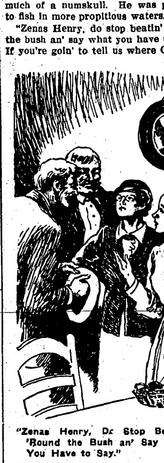
"He certainly was. Oh, Charlie was goin' fishin' right 'nough. He was aimed for deep water," grinned Zenas Henry.

"He wouldn't ketch no fish in Wilton harbor," sniffed Rebecca contemptuously. "Wouldn't you think he'd 'a' known that?"

"He warn't," observed Zenas Henry mildly, "figgerin' to. In fact, 'twarn't to Wilton harbor he was goin'. Bank cashier or not, Charlie warn't that much of a numskull. He was primed to fish in more propitious waters."

"Zenas Henry, do stop beatin' round the bush an' say what you have to say. If you're goin' to tell us where Charlie Eldridge went, out with it. If not, stop talkin' about it," burst out his wife sharply.



"Zenas Henry, Do Stop Beating 'Round the Bush an' Say What You Have to Say."

"Ain't I tellin' you fast as I can? Why get so het up? If you must know an' can't wait another minute, Charlie went fishin' in Crocker's Cove."

"Crocker's Cove?" gasped Abbie.

"Crocker's Cove?" echoed Rebecca.

"Crocker's Cove," nodded Zenas Henry.

"Mercy on us! Why—! Why, he—he must 'a' been goin'"—began Abbie.

"— to see The Widder," Rebecca interrupted, completing the sentence.

"I'd no notion he was tendin' up to her," Abbie said.

"Wal, he warn't 'xactly tendin' up to her—leastway, not today. Not what you could really call tendin' up," contradicted Zenas Henry, a twinkle in his eye. "Rather, I'd say 'twas t'other way round. Wouldn't you, Lemmy?"

Sagaciously, Lemuel bowed.

"You see," drawled on Zenas Henry, "no sooner had Charlie got into the boat an' pulled out into the channel than he had the usual, beginner's luck an' hooked a stragglin' bluefish. You'd oughter seen that critter pull! He 'most had Charlie out of the boat.

"I shouted to him to hang on an' so did Lemmy. In our excitement, we must 'a' bellered louder'n we meant to, 'cause in no time The Widder popped outer the house. She took one look at Charlie strugglin' in the boat, raced down to the landin' an' put out to him just about at the minute he was waverin' as to whether he'd chuck pole, line, an' sinker overboard, or go overboard himself.

"Quicker'n scat she had the fish-pole, an' while we looked on, Charlie dropped down kinder limp on the seat of the boat an' began tyin' up his hand in a spandy clean pocket handkerchief while The Widder gaffed the fish an' hauled it in."

"My soul!" exploded Abbie Brewster. "My soul an' body!"

"Later on," continued Zenas Henry, "Charlie overtook us. He'd stowed away his fish-pole somewheres. Leastway he didn't have it with him. When Lemmy an' me asked him where his fish was, he looked blacker'n thunder an' snapped out: 'Hang the fish!'

Beethoven Would Appease Goethe's Anger at Homage

Goethe and Beethoven were taking the cure at Carlsbad. They spent much time together but as they were always followed by crowds of admirers they chose the most solitary spots for their walks. Soon, however, their retreat was discovered and again people followed them and passers-by respectfully stopped and took their hats off. This irritated Goethe terribly and he complained of the impossibility of escaping homage.

Jumping Tower Popular in Air-Minded Russia

Parachute jumping has become a very popular sport and there is a jumping tower in the Park of Culture and Rest in Moscow where you may learn to get over your first fears. The peak of the parachute is tied to a cable, which runs out as you fall.

The cost is a few kopeks a jump and the Moscow boys and girls line up and jostle one another off the hundred-foot parapet nearly all day and throughout the evening, too. This craze is symbolized by the lighting at the Cafe Sport on Gorky street—a lamp in the form of an airman with a parachute shade.

Simplification of Bank Checks

New York.—In a bulletin issued by the Bank Management Commission of the American Bankers Association, plans are described for carrying on the simplification of bank checks, notes, drafts and similar instruments in respect to size and uniformity of arrangement of subject matter.

Detailed recommendations for this end were formulated by the association about ten years ago, the bulletin says, and promulgated by the United States Department of Commerce among banks, business houses using large numbers of checks, commercial stationers and lithographers. As a result about 85 per cent adherence to the recommendations was brought about. The present bulletin, which describes the standard specifications in full, is issued to maintain this high level of adherence to the recommendations.

Stanley Heath, a stranger whose powerboat runs aground on the treacherous Cape Cod shoals, stumbles into the Homestead and into the life of Marcia Howe, a young widow with whom half the men in the village are already in love. Out of his clothing falls a leather case crammed with gems and the enigma of this puzzling possession provides the pivot around which the story revolves. Marcia's blind, intuitive belief in the man's innocence brings its own reward.

NATIONAL SAVINGS MARK INCREASES

NEW YORK.—The annual savings compilation of the American Bankers Association for the year ending June 30, 1934, shows that for the first time since 1930 total savings in all American banks recorded an annual increase. A statement by W. Espey Albig, Deputy Manager of the association in charge of its Savings Division, in the organization's monthly magazine "Banking," says that savings deposited in banks as of June 30, 1934, gained 2.5 per cent as compared with a year earlier.

"The aggregate is an increase over last year of $742,132,000, the first since the year which closed June 30, 1930," he says. "This is a notable achievement, for the decline since 1930 had been precipitate and all-embracing. In that year savings had reached the all-time high of $28,478,631,000. A year ago the amount was $21,125,534,000, a loss in three years of $7,353,097,000. This year the figure stands at $21,867,666,000.

"Depositors, too, have gained in number, going from 39,262,442 on June 30, 1933, to 39,562,174 on June 30 this year, a gain of 299,732. Four years ago there were 52,720,432 depositors, or one depositor for each 2.3 persons in the country. Now there is one account for each 3.2 persons."

Arrested Deer Poacher

Arrest of a South Dakota law violator who had been shooting deer in Minnesota and transporting the venison back across the border was announced last week by the division of game and fish.

Several other convictions for illegal possession of venison were obtained in connection with the same case, indicating that Monsee was one of a group of poachers that has been operating in the vicinity of Northome for some time.

Monsee boasted freely to his friends about his success in obtaining venison in Minnesota and it is thought that he had been a frequent law violator.

Elmer A. Benson Succeeds Schall As U. S. Senator

Elmer A. Benson, state commissioner of banks and long active in the Farmer-Labor movement, was appointed United States Senator late last week by Governor Floyd B. Olson. Mr. Benson will fill out the unexpired term of the late Senator Thomas D. Schall, Republican who died as a result of injuries suffered when he was struck by an automobile.

Governor Olson made the appointment following recommendations by the Farmer-Labor State Executive committee and the State Central committee that Mr. Benson be chosen for the Senate seat.

Elmer A. Benson

Mr. Benson was born in Appleton, Minn., on Sept. 22, 1895. His parents, Thomas H. and Dora Benson, who settled in Swift County in the late 60,s after coming to this country from Norway in 1866, celebrated their 59th wedding anniversary on Christmas day. The town of Benson in Swift county was named for Elmer Benson's uncle Ben H. Benson.

Mr. Benson was graduated at the Appleton high school in 1915. He entered the St. Paul College of law in that year and was graduated there previous to entering the army in February, 1918. He went overseas in July, 1918, returning the following December. In February, 1919, he returned to St. Paul and was admitted to the bar.

Subsequently he became assistant cashier of the First National Bank of Appleton, and in 1923 he became cashier of the Farmers and Merchants Bank at Appleton, where he remained until January1, 1933, when he was appointed state securities commissioner by Governor Olson. In May of the same year he was appointed bank commissioner. While serving as bank commissioner he has been a firm champion of the independent banker and the independent merchant.

Mr. Benson was married on October 14, 1922, to Frances Miller of Appleton. They have two children, Lois, 10, and Thomas, 7.

The new senatorial appointee is a member of the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars. He has been commander, adjutant, and treasurer of the Appleton Legion post. Long a champion of the veterans cause, Mr. Benson has announced that he will fight for the prompt passage of the soldiers' bonus when he goes to Washington.

Mr. Benson announces that he will press for the passage of the Frazier-Lemke farm mortgage refinancing bill, adequate social securrity legislation, and measures designed to keep this country out of war.

WOULD PROTECT BANKING FIELD IN RURAL AREAS

American Bankers Association Announces Purpose to Combat Return of Excessive Number of Banks

CITES LAX CHARTER POLICIES IN THE PAST

Finds a Chief Cause of Bank Failures Was Too Many Banks—Existing Sound Banks Serving Communities Well

NEW YORK. — Existing sound banks, especially the small banks in the rural districts which are serving their communities well, should be protected from any return of the overbanked local conditions caused by former lax chartering policies, which were mainly to blame for the unfavorable failure record of the past, says the Economic Policy Commission of the American Bankers Association. This is brought out in a report covering an investigation by the commission of bank failures and public policies in chartering banks.

"The Commission's study gives an impressive revelation of how great a part mistaken public policies in the chartering of banks played in creating the unsound banking structure which finally collapsed with the Bank Holiday in March 1933," Robert V. Fleming, president of the association, says in a foreword.

"Over-production of banks, literally by thousands, over many years in the face of insistent warnings not only from bankers and others who recognized the danger, but even more so from the mounting records of bank failures themselves, 's clearly shown to have constituted as a whole one of the greatest single economic errors in the history of the Nation."

A Recurrence Feared

He refers to fears of a recurrence of over-banking recently expressed by Federal banking authorities, to the powers given the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation by the provision of the Banking Act of 1935 over the admission of banks to membership in the insurance fund, to strengthened state laws and to the policies now being followed by both national and state supervisory authorities aimed to safeguard the nation against over-banking.

"But sound laws and conscientious officials are not of themselves always sufficient safeguard in any field of our complex national life unless they have the active support of public opinion," he adds. "It is the purpose of the American Bankers Association to aid in marshaling public opinion in support of both national and state supervisory authorities in their efforts to strengthen and protect the banking structure."

The Economic Policy Commission summarizes its findings in part as follows:

"The facts show a distinct causal relationship between the over-chartering of banks and the abnormal bank failure conditions that prevailed from 1920 to the bank holiday in 1933. It is desirable that studies be made on the basis of experience to develop standards governing the number of banks or the volume of bank capital which can be successfully operated.

"Such a study would embrace the question whether banking facilities can best be supplied to the rural districts by small unit banks or by branches from banks of substantial capital in larger centers. Existing sound banks, which are serving their communities well should be protected from any return of the over-banked local conditions caused in the past by lax chartering policies.

Banking Officials Queried

"An inquiry among state bank commissioners shows a preponderant opinion against increasing materially the number of banks, coupled with the fact that present laws give them sufficient discretion to prevent a repetition of the grave errors of the past.

"Under prevailing abnormal conditions, with the Federal Government extensively exercising loaning powers in competition with the banks, and with industry itself so largely supplied with funds as to render it to a great degree independent of normal bank borrowing, the banking structure even with its present reduced numbers, finds it difficult to support its existing capital investment and operating personnel.

"These are new factors, intensifying the need for highly prudent and restrictive chartering policies. We urge the retirement of the Federal Government from the banking business as rapidly as the return of normal business conditions warrant."

Mrs. Ben Nyberg left Monday for Minneapolis where she will visit a few days.

Northwest School News

The winter term will open at the Northwest School of Agriculture on Monday, January 6. Accordeng to Supt. A. A. Dowell the opening day will be devoted to registration of old and new students with the first classes scheduled for the following day. Many new students are expected to enroll at this time as full credit towards graduation is allowed for the three months winter term closing March 28.

In addition to vocational courses in agriculture in agriculture and home economics, emphasis is being placed on subjects dealing with the cultural side of life. These include music, public speaking, debate and citizenship. School officials are convinced that the time has come when a successful citizen must look beyond local or provincial boundaries and think in terms not, only of the nation, but of the world.

During the past fall, Registrar J. W. Mlinar reported the largest enrolment since the school first opened its doors in 1906. A great many students have benefited from the recent state law whereby eligible students are reimbursed by the state for necessary fees.

47 Road Jobs To Be Let

There are 25 grading jobs, one grading and gravelin, nine gravelling, two culverts and ten bridges in the call. Counties represented are Pope, Becker, Benton, Carver, Clearwater, Dodge, Douglas, Freeborn, Goodhue, Meeker, Olmstead, Ottertail, Pipestone, Red Lake, Swift, Todd, Itasca, Clay, Cook, Pennington, Nobles, Cass, Grant Chippewa, Wabasha, and Isanta.

The Vogue For MIXED VEGETABLES

WELL blended vegetables are like well blended colors. They produce harmony. Every housewife knows how important it is to get a variety of vegetables into the family diet, and how difficult it is in households where Mary likes one vegetable and Johnnie likes another. The task of scraping, dicing and cooking takes time and labor.

Canners have produced a harmony of flavor and taken a task off the hands of the housewife, in preparing delicious canned mixed vegetables. You will want to know lots of delicious ways to serve them this winter. For example:

For Chilly Days

Scalloped Mixed Vegetables: Turn the contents of one No. 2 can mixed vegetables which have been drained, into a buttered baking dish, and pour over one-half cup of cream. Mix together one-fourth cup grated cheese and one-fourth cup buttered crumbs, and sprinkle over the top. Brown in an oven. This serves five persons.

Baked Stuffed Peppers: Cut off the stem ends of six or eight medium-sized green peppers and remove the seeds and membrane. Parboil for two or three minutes in boiling water and drain. Combine the contents of one No. 2 can mixed vegetables with one cup of white sauce. Season well and fill the peppers with the mixture. Top with buttered crumbs. If desired, a square of sliced cheese may be placed on each pepper. Place close together in a shallow pan and surround with a little hot water. Bake until tender and browned, or about thirty minutes. This serves six persons.

Vegetable Pie: Turn drained vegetables from a No. 2 can of mixed vegetables into a buttered baking dish and pour over the contents of one 10½-ounce can of tomato soup. Roll out biscuit dough, cut in rounds and lay on top. Bake for fifteen to twenty minutes in a hot oven. This serves eight persons.*

Mr. and Mrs. Hilmer Lunke, Mr. and Mrs. Levine Anderson. Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Anderson and daughter. Mr. Bernard Udstrand, Mr. Willis Johnson and Miss Ella Johnson were dinner guests at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Anton Rodahl on Sunday.

GERMS JUMP EIGHT FEET IN SNEEZE, AUTHORITIES FIND

Because health officials have long contended that germs causing the common cold, from which several millions of the population suffer annually, are spread chiefly by coughs and sneezes, the American Institute of Sanitation recently conducted a series of experiments to determine just how far a germ can travel in a sneeze.

Test plates were prepared with a suitable medium to receive bacteria and were held at different distances from persons afflicted with cold to catch germs projected into the air by sneezes and explosive coughs. After being exposed to the sneezes the test plates were examined after the colonies of bacteria that had developed from the seed were large enough to be counted. Precautions were taken to precent contamination of the plates from outside sources. It was found from the experiments that a deep sneeze can project germs as far as eight feet. Conversation carried on in ordinary tones may result in a germ screen being sent out to a distance of two or three feet.

"In view of the ease by which countless germs may be rained on surrounding objects by a sneeze or cough, the best way to prevent colds is to keep from contact with sufferers, both directly and indirectly," comments the institute. "Reading a book or using a pencil after sneezers should be avoided.

"Rigid rules of sanitation should prevail in buildings used by a number of persons. First, all the sunshine possible should be admitted. Drawn shades are favorable to prolonging the life of disease bacteria outside the body. In schools and offices a modern, efficient disinfectant should be added to the mop water. Dry sweeping and dusting should be avoided. Brooms and dusters extend the range of the original sneezes. Instead of dusting the desks should be wiped off with a cloth wrung out frequently from water containing adequate disinfectant.

"The use of antiseptic mouth washes by cold sufferers may be regarded as both a personal and a public health measure. Through such reduction of the number of bacteria in the mouth, there are less bacterial buckshot in a sneeze."

"Big Ben" Not Name of London Clock, but Bell

Do you know that there's no such clock as Big Ben? That name is given simply to the bell of the clock over the Houses of Parliament. Big Ben's chime is little more than a whisper compared with what it might be, for the bell is cracked, and the huge hammer originally made for it cannot be used in case it might wreck it.

The M. P.'s who sit immediately under Big Ben do not hear it strike until its tones have already been heard in the furthermost corners of the British Isles! Wireless reception is instantaneous; but the sound of Big Ben takes a fraction of a second to reach anybody on the ground who is not "listening in."—London Answers.

Accidents Cost as Many Lives in 1900 as Now

In spite of the increase in automobile deaths in the United States accidents cost no more lives now, in proportion to the population, than they did in 1900. Deaths from railroad and street car accidents, drowning, burns, poisonous gas, food poisoning, and suffocation, have dropped from an average of 47.7 per 100,000 population during 1900-1905 to 17.9 during 1931-1934, an improvement of 29.8.

The rate from automobile accidents was practically zero in 1900 and 28.4 in 1934. The one about balances the other. Accidents are now a greater hazard than any disease, except heart disease, cancer and nephritis—Science Service.

SYNOPSIS

The future of the still youthful and comely "Widder" Marcia Howe, recently released by death from her idling, selfish husband, is a conversational tit-bit among housewives of the little hamlet of Wilton. Eligible bachelors and widowers also are interested.

CHAPTER II

In the meantime, Marcia Howe, the heroine of this escapade, comfortably ensconced in her island homestead, paid scant heed to the fact that she and her affairs were continually on the tongues of the outlying community.

She was not ignorant of it, for her intuitive sixth sense made her well aware her goings and comings were watched. This knowledge, however, far from nettling her, as it might have done had she been a woman blessed with less sense of humor, afforded her infinite amusement. She valued her kindly, if inquisitive, neighbors at their true worth; and met the world with a smile singularly free from hardness or cynicism.

Bitter though her experience had been, it had neither taken from, nor, miraculously, had it dimmed her faith in her particular star. On the contrary there still glowed in her gray eyes that sparkle of anticipation one sees in the eyes of one who stands a-tiptoe on the threshold of adventure. Apparently she had in her nature an unquenchable spirit of hope that nothing could destroy. She was still young and the highway of life, alluring in rosy mists, beckoned her along its mysterious path with persuasive hand.

Her start, she confessed, had been an unpropitious one. But starts sometimes were like that; and did not the old adage affirm that a bad beginning made for a fair ending?

Furthermore, the error had been her own. She had been free to choose and she had chosen unwisely. Why whine about it? One must be a sport and play the game. She was older now and better fitted to look after herself than she had been at seventeen. Only a fool made the same blunder twice, and if experience had been a pitiless teacher, it had also been a helpful and convincing one.

The past with its griefs, its humiliations, its heartbreak, its failure lay behind—the future all before her. It was hers—hers! She would be wary what she did with it and never again would she squander it for dross.

If there lingered deep within her heart vague, unsatisfied yearnings, Marcia resolutely held over these filmy imaginings a tight rein. To be busy—that was her gospel. She never allowed herself to remain idle for any great length of time. Like an athlete set to run a race, she gloried in her physical strength.

Today, as she moved swiftly about the house and her deft hands made tidy the rooms, she had that sense of being in step with the world. The morning, crisp with an easterly breeze, had stirred the sea into a swell that rose rhythmically in measureless, breathing immensity far away to its clear-cut, sapphire horizon. The sands had never glistened more white; the surf never curled at her doorway in a prettier, more feathery line. From the Point, where her snowy domains dipped into more turbulent waters, she could hear the grating roar of pebbles mingle with the crash of heavier breakers.

It all spoke to her of home—home as she had known it from childhood—as her father and her father's father had known it. The salt of deep buried caverns was in her veins; the chant of the ocean echoed the beating of her own heart.

Lonely?

If she needed anything it was a companion to whom to cry: "Isn't it glorious to be alive?" and she already had such a one.

Never was there such a comrade as Prince Hal!

Human beings often proved themselves incapable of grasping one another's moods—but he? Never!

She would never want for a welcome while he had strength to wag his white plume of tail; nor lack affection so long as he was able to race up the beach and race back again to hurl himself upon her with his sharp, staccato yelp of joy.

Oh, she was worlds better off with Prince Hal than if she were linked up with someone of her own genus who could not understand.

Besides, she was not going to be alone. She had decided to try an experiment.

Jason had had an orphaned niece out in the Middle West—his sister's child—a girl in her early twenties, and Marcia had invited her to the island for a visit.

In fact, Sylvia was expected today.

That was why a bowl of pansies stood upon the table in the big bedroom at the head of the stairs, and why its fireplace was heaped with driftwood ready for lighting. That was also the reason Marcia now stood critically surveying her preparations.

She was especially desirous the old home should look its best today, for the outside world had contributed a richness of setting that left her much to live up to. Sylvia had never seen the ocean. She must love it. But would she? That was to be the test.

There was room, money, affection enough for two beneath the Homestead roof and Sylvia was alone in the world. Moreover, Marcia felt an odd sense of obligation toward Jason. At the price of his life he had given her back her freedom. It was a royal gift and she owed him something in return.

She was too honest to pretend she had loved him or mourned his loss. Soon after the beginning of their life together, she had discovered he was not at all the person she had supposed him. The gay recklessness which had so completely bewitched her and which she had thought to be manliness had been mere bombast and bravado. At bottom he was a braggart—small, cowardly, purposeless—a ship without a rudder.

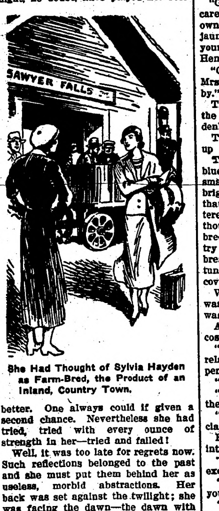
Endowed with good looks and a devil-may-care charm, he had called her his star and pleaded his need of her, and she had mistaken pity for love and believed that to help guide his foundering craft into port was a heaven-sent mission.

Alas, she had over-estimated both her own power and his sincerity. Jason had no real desire to alter his conduct. Instead, day by day he slipped lower and lower and, unable to aid him or prevent disaster, she had been forced to look on.

Her love for him was dead, and her self-conceit was dealt a humiliating blow.

Sometimes she reproached herself for the tragedy and, scrutinizing the past, wondered whether she might not have prevented it. Had she done her full part; been as patient, sympathetic, understanding as she ought to have been? Did his defeat lie at her door?

With the honesty characteristic of her, she could not see that it did. She might, no doubt, have played her role better. One always could if given a second chance. Nevertheless she had tried, tried with every ounce of strength in her—tried and failed!



She Had Thought of Sylvia Hayden as Farm-Bred, the Product of an Inland, Country Town.

Well, it was too late for regrets now. Such reflections belonged to the past and she must put them behind her as useless, morbid abstractions. Her back was set against the twilight; she was facing the dawn—the dawn with its promise of happier things.

She had paid for her folly—if indeed folly it had been. Now with optimism and courage she looked fearlessly forward. That was why, as she caught up her hat, a smile curled her lips.

The house did look pretty, the day was glorious. She was a-tingle with eagerness to see what it might bring. Calling Prince Hal, she stood before him.

Obeying her he lay down with paws extended, the keeper of the Homestead.

While she paced the platform at Sawyer Falls, the nearest station, Marcia fidgeted. She had never seen any of Jason's family. At first a desultory correspondence had taken place between him and his sister, Margaret; then gradually it had died a natural death—the result, no doubt, of his indolence and neglect. When the letters ceased coming, Marcia had let matters take their course.

She had written Margaret a short note after his death and had received a reply expressing such genuine grief it had more than ever convinced her that her course had been the wise and generous one. What troubled her most in the letter had been its outpouring of sympathy for herself. She detested subterfuge and as she read sentence after sentence, which should have meant so much and in reality meant so little, the knowledge that she had not been entirely frank had brought with it an uncomfortable sense of guilt. It was not what she had said but what she had withheld that accused her.

Marcia Howe was no masquerader, and until this moment the hypocrisy she had practiced had demanded no sustained acting. Little by little, moreover, the pricking of her conscience had been forgotten. Miles of distance, years of silence separated her from Jason's relatives and it had been easy to allow the deceit, if deceit it had been, to stand.

But now those barriers were to be broken down and she suddenly realized that to keep up the fraud so artlessly begun was going to be exceedingly difficult. She was not a clever dissembler.

If she had followed her usual custom and been open with Jason's sister, the dilemma in which she now found herself would never have arisen. Granted that her motive had been a worthy one had it not been audacious to make of herself a god and withhold from Margaret Hayden facts she had had every right to know, facts that belonged to her? Such burdens were given human beings to bear, not to escape from. But if with mistaken kindness she had been guided by a pygmy, short-sighted philosophy, it was too late, reflected Marcia, for her to remedy her error in judgment.

But Sylvia—Jason's niece?

With her coming, all the arguments Marcia had worn threadbare for and against the exposure of Jason's true character presented themselves afresh. Should she deceive the girl as she had her mother? Oh should she tell her the truth?

She was still pondering the question when the train, with its single car, came to a stop beside the platform.

Three passengers descended.

The first was a young Portuguese woman, dark of face, and carrying a bulging bag from which protruded gay bits of embroidery.

"Now we must find Henry," the girl was saying in a clear but gentle voice. "Of course he'll be here. Look! Isn't that he—the man just driving up in a car? I guessed as much from your description. You need not have worried, you see. Good-by, Mrs. Doane. I hope you'll have a lovely visit with your son."

"Good-by, my dear. You've taken care of me like as if you'd been my own daughter. I ain't much used to jauntin' about, and it frets me. Are your folks here? If not, I'm sure Henry wouldn't mind—"

Then as Marcia watched, she saw the lithe young creature stoop suddenly and kiss the withered cheek.

The next instant she was swinging up the platform.

The slim figure in its well-tailored blue suit; the trimly shod feet; the small hat so provokingly tilted over the bright eyes, the wealth of golden curls that escaped from beneath it all shattered Marcia's calculations. She had thought of Sylvia Hayden as farm-bred—the product of an inland, country town—a creature starved for breath of outlook and social opportunity. It was disconcerting to discover that she was none of these things.

Well, if she was chagrined, there was consolation in seeing that the girl was equally discomfited.

As she approached Marcia, she accosted her uncertainly with the words:

"Pardon me. I am looking for a relative—a Mrs. Howe. You don't happen to know, do you—"

"I'm Marcia."

"But I thought—I expected—" gasped the girl.

"And I thought—I expected—" Marcia mimicked gaily.

For a moment they looked searchingly into one another's face, then laughed.

"And fancy having a niece like you!"

"Well, all I can say is I'm glad I came," was the girl's retort. "I wasn't altogether sure I should be when I started east. I said to myself: 'Sylvia you are taking a big chance. You may just be wasting your money.'"

"You may still find it's been wasted."

"No, I shan't. I know already it has been well spent," announced the girl.

"Wait until you see where you're going."

"I am going to Paradise—I'm certain of it. The glimpses I've had of the ocean from the train have convinced me of that. Do you live where you can see it, Aunt Marcia? Will it be nearby?"

"I shall not tell you one thing," Marcia replied. "At least only one, and that is that I flatly refuse to be Aunt Marcia to you! It makes me feel like Methuselah. I really haven't that amount of dignity."

"Ah, now my last weak, wavering doubt is vanished. Not only am I glad I came but I wish I'd come before."

"You weren't asked until now," observed Marcia with cryptic brevity.

"That wouldn't have mattered. Had I known what you were like, I should have come without an invitation."

In spite of herself, Marcia smiled.

"Here's the car," she answered. "What about your trunk?"

"I didn't bring one."

With the Minnesota Lawmakers

Indications that $5,400,000 available for relief would be distributed before winter has unfurled its last blizzard were seen when it was learned that an acute financial situation exists in the Twin Cities and Duluth, which lack enough municipal funds to tide them over until spring.

Only $400,000 remains of the original $5,000,000 appropriated to cover relief for the year ending June 30, 1936. Legislators expressed a willingness to make available the $5,000,000 appropriation for the year ending June 30, 1937 plus the remaining money from the 1936 fund, but it was doubtful if even this sum would take care of the needs. In addition to the three larger Minnesota cities, several communities in the northern part of the state need emergency allotments

Hoping to avoid an additional financial burden on the state, a legislative committee together with city officials sped to the national capital to plead for additional aid. Little hope is being fostered, however, that such a request will be met.

Meanwhile legislators started the wheels turning on tax legislation, a house committee moving out for action the plan to collect $85,000,000 in delinquent taxes The method provides for property owners paying their back levies over a 10 year period, provided the current taxes are kept up.

Possibility of a Seabury investigation of cirme conditions in Minneapolis, an aftermath of the Liggett murder, was seen when the senate rules committee held up action to kill the proposal for such a probe until Sen. M. J. Galvin, Winona, sponsor of the project, has had an opportunity to explain his views. The bill previously had received a severe setback when it was ruled out of order at a special session.

Galvin's resolution proposed that the investigation be put in the hands of a committee of three senators and four members of the house "The Liggett murder is a challenge of the underworld to government."

The house by a vote of 92 to 19, approved under suspension of the rules a concurrent resolution to adjourn Saturday for a recess until Monday, December 30, at 3 p. m. Two amendments offered by Representative Charles Wangensteen of Chisholm, the first asking that the house reconvene the day after New Year's, January 2, and the second that it recess only to the day after Christmas, were voted down.

An attempt at reconsideration of the omnibus tax revision bill, designed to raise $23,000,000 to finance old age pensions and give real estate owners a reduction in their 1936 levies was sponsored before the legislature by Rep. W. R. Youngquist, Minneapolis, but it was indicated that the bill would need considerably more support before it can get to the floor of either house. Senator Charles M. Orr, chairman of the senate rules committee, stated that the governor was certain to veto the measure since it included a sales tax clause, and that support in the legislature would not be enough to override that veto.

With a view to increasing tax rates on chain stores, gifts, inheritances, and incomes, four new tax bills were introduced in the house. Rates on incomes in the higher brackets would be doubled under provisions of a bill introduced by Rep. A. D. Crissey, Morris, while exemptions would be lowered.

Rep. Edward Hage, Milan, introduced a measure to reduce legal interest rates in the state. On sums over $250, the rate would be reduced from six to five per cent, while on sums under that figure, a seven per cent would be permitted. Rates over seven per cent would constitute usury.

In a special message to the senate, Governor Olson asked the body to urge the federal governemnt to go ahead with the proposed purchase of state lands on northern Minnesota, composed of forest territory, the governor's sentiments being seconded in a resolution by Senator Gerald Mullin, Minneapolis.

While speculation centered on possible adjournment, the governor issued a solemn warning to legislators planning to avoid consideration of an unemployment insurance law in keeping with the federal security act. Olson stated that should the members fail to act on the measure or should they adjourn before considering it, he will not call another special session.

All indicatins pointed to the writing of the emergency relief measures, the old age pension measure, and the repeal of the expenditure control and corporate excess taxes

One plan of financing the pension bill was brought forth by Senator Louis E. Berg, St. Paul, who advocated an increase in the state liquor and wine tax. Wine levies could be boosted from 5 to 20 cents a gallon and taxes on hard liquors by 20 cents per gallon, he said, and one half of the revenue could be diverted to the pension fund

what Irvin S. Cobb thinks about:

Us Present-Day Sissies.

SANTA MONICA, CALIF.—Our ancestors, the men and women who whittled this country out of ramping wilderness—they were different, although perhaps difficult to get along with. They'd fight you over almost any issue—their personal rights, their public wrongs, their national principles, their private prejudices, their outer boundaries, their internal policies. They fought one another; they fought foreign powers. But, excusing politicians and professional whiners, they didn't do such an awful lot of fretting over the painfully primitive conditions of a pioneering life. We, their children, with too many laws we won't enforce, too many criminals we won't punish, too many unjust taxes we won't rebel against—we complain about everything. It's as though a race of eagles bred a breed of worms that turn only to turn the other cheek. I guess we're getting peevishly flabby.

Irvin S. Cobb.

I woke up this morning feeling as flabby as a cold flapjack, and I don't know when I've been peevisher. So I sat down and wrote this.

N.B.—And never mind telling me that a worm hasn't any cheek. I know that as well as you do.

Van Sweringen's Passing.

GRANTED, that in these shifting times there is a somewhat prevalent tendency to regard it this way and be governed accordingly: for a man to have been a success is a crime, but to have been a failure is a profession.

Even so, there's still a thrill, reading of the career of M. J. Van Sweringen. Horatio Alger might have written him. He starts life as a newsboy in Cleveland. Today, at fifty-four, he lies dead there.

How many millions he left, nobody knows. Probably he didn't much care. It must have been the sport and not the size of the game-bag that made him a dominant figure in railroading and finance.

That's one side of the American picture. The other side is that almost every one of us knows, or has heard, of a former reputed millionaire who'd like to get a good job somewhere selling newspapers.

* * *

The Source of an Idea.

I RAN across it the other day—this ancient one.

Shipwrecked mariners in crisis. Sea rising, life raft sinking beneath them, no rescue craft in sight. Situation seems to call for professions of faith. But nobody can quote from the Scriptures, nobody can sing a hymn, nobody even knows a prayer. Desperately, the mate speaks up: "Men, we gotta do somethin' pious—let's pass the hat."

I read that antique wheeze and in a flash the puzzle was solved. Now I know where they got the original idea—those economic wizards in and out of congress, who, in times like these, bob up with various theories, but all aimed at the same purpose; namely, that financial security can be restored not by giving industry a chance to recuperate, but by taking away the previous fruits of industry.

* * *

Hollywood's Newest Grievance.

HOLLYWOOD sentiment is that those alleged polygamists recently on trial over at Kingman, in Arizona, should be penalized for breaking the rules. You see, the curious colony up there in the desert favors having a lot of wives all at once, whereas the Hollywood championship team prefers various wives, one at a time, which prevents confusion and works out to the same gratifying high scores in the end.

But no matter how the law may serve those Arizona husbands, I would put in a plea for the female co-defendants charged with marrying 'em so copiously. For I've just seen some newspaper pictures of the male prisoners. Gentlemen of the jury, if they be true likenesses, those poor near-sighted women already have suffered enough. Talk about being more sinned against than sinning.

* * *

That Banker's Identity.

IF THE President won't name him, I shan't. But I'll bet anything—anything I have left, I mean—that the distinguished banker who told him this country could safely go in debt for quite a lot more billions is the same financial wizard who counseled me about my dainty little investments in the blithe, braw days before 1929. It certainly sounds like the same fellow.

On second thought, maybe not. Because the last I heard of my banker, he was sitting by the steam-pipes at a county poor-farm back East, telling the other inmates about an infallible system for beating those stock market boys. You see, he was sucker enough to follow his own advice. Can you imagine?

Festive Trappings Bring Joy to Brides of Moscow

Weddings in Soviet Russia are beginning to take on the romantic trimmings of the bourgeois West. In the October quarter of Moscow a special room has been provided in the registration bureau where couples may sign the marriage contract. It is furnished with oriental rugs, elaborate hangings, overstuffed furniture, and flowers. The young woman registrar is smartly gowned and wishes the couples happiness with all the grace of French and Italian municipal marriage officials.

Formerly weddings, deaths, and births were all recorded in one room. But brides protested vehemently against being married in the same room where weeping widows were recording the deaths of their husbands.

Stanley Heath, a stranger whose powerboat runs aground on the treacherous Cape Cod shoals, stumbles into the Homestead and into the life of Marcia Howe, a young widow with whom half the men in the village are already in love. Out of his clothing falls a leather case crammed with gems and the enigma of this puzzling possession provides the pivot around which the story revolves. Marcia's blind, intuitive belief in the man's innocence brings its own reward.

Doctors Urge Adoption of 1936 Health Resolutions

Healthiest New Year predicted by Minnesota physicians for those who live up to suggestions.

Following are ten health resolutions suggested by the Public Health Education Committee of the Minnesota State Medical Association for health and safety and peace in 1936.

The committee ventures to predict the healthiest year on record in Minnesota if even part of them are followed conscientiously by Minnesotans in 1936.

1. I will include some milk, fruit and green vegetables in my diet every day knowing that, no matter what else I eat, the inclusion of these will be a reasonable assurance that I am getting essential food elements for growth and strength.

2. I will insist upon scrupulous cleanliness in handling, preparing and eating of food.

3. I will not expose my friends to my "cold" and I will take the utmost pains, even at the risk of giving offense, to protect, particularly the children, from anybody else who exhibit "cold" symptoms.

4. I will report to my doctor any suspicious lumps or stubborn sores that do not heal or any abnormol discharge or persistent pain. Thus I shall be giving myself a more than 80 per cent chance of complete cure, in case of cancer.

5. I will not take a laxative in the presence of abdominal pain because abdominal pain of any duration may mean appendicitis or bowel obstruction and a laxative is the worst possible treatment for either.

6. I will go over my medicine chest and see that no dangerous arsenic or other pills are lying around where blundering hands can get at them.

7. I will see that my children, if I have any in my charge, are protected against diptheria, smallpox and tested to find out if they have been infected with tuberculosis.

8. I will give myself and my family the benefit of a complete physical examination whether we are sick or not, to help us avoid illness this year.

9. I will go to my dentist at least once this year.

10. I will get as near to eight hours of carefree sleep each night knowing that I am in the best possible condition to work hard, play hard and enjoy myself in 1936.

Nature can't be fooled. The man or woman who neglects a cold, especially the cough that lingers, is not fooling nature but he may be inviting disaster by his neglect.

Magnus Files

His action in filing before the state indorsing convention ends definitely any chance of harmony in Farmer-Labor ranks during the campaign this year and assures a wide open primary fight for the gubernatorial nomination and probably for all other places on the party ticket, including United States senator.

A thinly veiled attack on Governor Olson, now in a Rochester hospital following an operation for a stomach ailment, was made by Johnson in a prepared statement handed to newspaper men after he had appeared in the secretary of state's office at 9:25 A. M. with his filing fee.

GOVERNMENT BANK UNSUITED TO U. S.

QUOTES PRESIDENT JACKSON

Extent and Diversity of This Country Presents Different Situation From Europe and Makes Regional Banking Necessary.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—A refutation of arguments in favor of a government-owned central bank system for the United States is presented in a statement by R. S. Hecht, President of the American Bankers Association, based on exhaustive studies of European central banks. He also points out the disastrous consequences of previous central bank experiments in the United States.

"Our present regional Federal Reserve System under private ownership is infinitely better for this country than would be a government-owned and controlled central bank," Mr. Hecht says. "If history teaches us anything, it is that it is almost certain that a central bank so owned would be run to meet the varying exigencies of the government in power rather than to serve the commercial needs of the country."

Central banking has been tried twice in the United States, but was finally abolished because the credit control which the central banks exercised became objectionable and unpopular, he goes on to say.

What Andrew Jackson Said

"The continued existence of the Second Bank finally became a bitter political issue and President Jackson succeeded in abolishing it," Mr. Hecht says. "Permit me to quote from his farewell address: 'The immense capital and peculiar privileges bestowed upon it enabled it to exercise despotic sway over the other banks in every part of the country. From its superior strength it could seriously injure, if not destroy, the business of any of them which might incur its resentment. . . . If you had not conquered, the government would have passed from the hands of the many to the hands of the few; and this organized money power, from its secret conclave, would have dictated the choice of your highest officers. . . The forms of your government might, for a time, have remained, but its living spirit would have departed from it.' "

When the Wilson Administration considered banking reform it carefully kept away from vesting central banking powers in a single institution and instead introduced the regional idea by creating twelve reserve banks located in different economic and geographical sections of the country, Mr. Hecht says, a plan that has worked exceedingly well because the separate banks are under the guidance of men chosen on account of their intimate acquaintance with the problems and needs of their respective territories. He continues:

"The great size and diversity of America tends to make a central bank undesirable. The central banks of Europe such as the Banks of England, France and Germany, cover areas not as large as some of our states. A central bank in the United States on the other hand would be called upon to administer the financial policies of an area larger than all of Europe, in which there are quite a number of central banks.

Subservient to Popular Demands

"Moreover, history has proven that any banking system entirely owned and dominated by the government usually demonstrates much greater ability in aiding expansion of credit than in putting on the brakes at the right time to prevent undue inflation by restraining and contracting credit. This is easy to understand because in times of depression everyone is urging the government to make money and credit easy and to encourage expansion.

"On the other hand, it always has been and always will be a difficult task for any government to call a halt in time of apparent prosperity because in the very nature of things the government would be very sensitive to public criticism and would hesitate to take any action which would tend to curtail business activity. It is such undue susceptibility to popular demands which makes government banking inherently weak.

"Our studies show that of all the central banks at present existing there are only four whose stock is owned by the government. The newest central bank is that of Canada, which opened its doors only a few months ago after a most exhaustive study had been made of the experience of all nations with the result that the stock of the Bank of Canada is privately owned."

The American Bankers Association, Mr. Hecht says, is convinced that a central bank would not be in the interest of the public or the banks. This position, he added, is "well understood by the President and the leaders in his Administration for we have been absolutely frank with them in all of our discussions and have missed no opportunity for emphasizing that in our opinion no banking system will, in the long run, be sound if it is dominated entirely by the ever-changing political administrations. We should do all we can to keep our banking mechanism as far removed from partisan politics as possible."

AAA Is Ruled Illegal In U. S. Supreme Court Decision

The U. S. supreme court splintered AAA—second cornerstone of the New Deal—so completely Monday that previously-planned patchwork was all but forgotten.

An uncompromising 6-3 opinion not only wiped out President Roosevelt's cherished farm-aid program, but threw a shadow of doubt over other recent major legislation.

The treasury Monday night halted all processing tax collection under the law, and said that "for the present, no checks will be issued for benefit or rental payments, or refunds, or for administrative purposes."

Treasury officials interpreted the order, issued after a three-hour conference with its counsel, as halting further salary checks to AAA's 6,500 full-time employes, as well as part-time workers throughout the nation.

Farmers have received $1,127,000,000 since 1933 for reducing crop production under AAA's plan of federal control.

The White House conferees said Mr. Roosevelt hoped to find means under the decision to pay farmers who have fulfilled existing contracts — up to their invalidation Monday.

Mr. and Mrs. Leo Horien and family were entertained at the Ludvig Larson home last Wednesday evening.

Minnesota Historical Society To Catalog Church Records

The Minnesota Historical society is making an effort to enlarge its collection of church records and to bring together information about materials preserved in local church archives. To further this purpose, a questionnaire asking for information about such archives has been sent to every Congregational pastor in Minnesota. Plans are under way for sending similar questionnaires to ministers of all other denominations.

Each Congregational pastor has been asked to make a list of church registers, minute books, treasurers' ledgers, Sunday school records, and other manuscripts in the archives of his church; to supply a list of pastors; and to list historical sketches, programs, and other printed material about the church.

In this connection it is interesting to note that the Minnesota diocese of the Episcopal church has recently placed among its archives, in the custody of the state historical society, about twenty volumes of local parish registers. Included are records of churches at Glencoe, Shakopee, Farmington, and Elk River.

Safetygrams

The Safety Man

What to do in case of accident.

1. Stop! and render first aid to the injured.

2. Stop! regardless of how insignificant the accident may be. The "hit and run" driver is a criminal and punished as such.

3. Stop! and help the other fellow if he is in trouble. You may be in a similar predicament yourself some day. Be a "Good Samaritan."

Don't lose your head. Call a doctor if necessary or get the injured to the nearest hospital.

5. Get the names and addresses of every one who witnessed the accident.

6. Get license numbers of all cars involved, direction they were moving, and axact location of accident.

7. Notify your insurance company by wire or telephone, and follow its instructions.

what Irvin S. Cobb thinks about:

What They Want to Read.

CULVER CITY, CALIF.—Beautiful actress mysteriously dead. Crazed worker turns peaceful street into a shambles. Mother of three hanged for murder. Nurse suspected of inflicting "mercy deaths" on helpless patients. Confession by Hauptmann predicted. Rich man's son kidnaped. Former President Hoover tries to make humorous speech. . . All these tragic things on the same front page.

Irvin S. Cobb

Earnest thinkers who'll accuse the newspapers of sensationalism for featuring distressful happenings, forget that, to live, newspapers must print what people want to read about, not what professional uplifters and most publishers, and many editors, would like them to read. To publish any other sort of newspaper for popular consumption would require an endowment fund bigger than the average reformer's ignorance of human nature.

Extra: In the excitement, one more saddening headline almost was overlooked; Governor Talmadge of Georgia still thinks he's running for President.

The Living Dead.

Doctor Carrel is a bit late with his theory that human beings might be dried out and filed away for a matter of 200 years or so, and then brought back to life again. Only the other night I was speaking at a dinner where there were many who must have undergone the process—only they hadn't been brought back to life yet.

It used to be that I had better results, talking at banquets. But lately my audiences and I seem to be drifting apart. Or maybe it's merely poor old Mr. Cobb that's drifting apart.

Seriously, I think it would be a mistake to dehydrate a fellow the way Doctor Carrel suggests and set him aside in some quiet ratproof place for a couple of centuries and then return him to consciousness. He probably wouldn't notice much change in radio gags—they'll still be using the same ones—but, judging by the present rate of progress, think what taxes will be then!

FOR a while it seemed that, when the Republicans meet next year, it would be for memorial services at Armageddon, and adjourning thence to the cemetery. Now it's settled they'll meet at Cleveland, and the official silver-lining locator, Chairman Fletcher, predicts it won't be any lodge of sorrow either.

Also, the Democrats, who not so long ago were figuring their 1936 to-do would merely be a grand ratification rally, replete with Farley and flags, are now inclined to go in for a regular convention, with resolutions deploring, among other things, the Literary Digest.

Well, a fight is better than a massacre. And upon the horizon of both parties looms the figure of old Doc Townsend, coming with a little plan, and if you don't think he's beginning to cast a shadow, ask grandpa. Meanwhile, the Ham Fish boom for President spreads like cold molasses.

Stamps and Such.

OWING to the Christmas rush, our Post Office department let an entire week slip by without turning loose any special stamp commemorating somebody or something. That means a double-header later.

If you're going in for new United States issues, you'd better figure on an addition to the little home-nest. You won't be able to get your collection in an album; you'll need a bowling alley. Because, when we run out of people or places or events to name stamps for, Big Chief Farley can draw on the alphabet and still be in the fashion.

Peace Prize for Sale.

STICKING up their heads just long enough to announce there'd be no peace prize for 1935, the judges ducked right back into the sub-cellar, out of the way of brickbats and night-sticks.

At the moment, all was quiet and harmony. With the exceptions of one large three-ring war and several smaller ones, and riots of one or more of the standard varieties—racial, religious, political, industrial or economic—going on simultaneously in seven major cities on four continents, which comes pretty close to being almost all the continents we have.

But before withholding the award, why didn't the judges take a quick glance in the direction of Greenland? There hasn't been a harsh word out of Greenland all year. I believe there was one other small country somewhere enjoying comparative peace but the name escapes me.

Spending Must Stop

Washington.—There has been much discussion lately concerning the liquidation of the dozens of New Deal emergency agencies. It is a discussion that is timely because, first, Mr. Roosevelt in his plans for the forthcoming government budget contemplates a shrinkage in the vast outlays represented in the emergency agencies, and second, it is a matter of political import. Whether Mr. Roosevelt is reelected or whether there should be a Republican succeed him in the White House in January, 1937, somebody must clean up the wreckage of the alphabetical soup—which is what all of these various agencies eventually must become. They cannot go on; an end must be had to the expenditures and that will conclude the operations of these agencies and, further, something in the way of permanency for agencies that may be kept must be worked out.

It is one of the real problems of government. Those who have been in Washington any length of time recognize that it is much easier to establish a government bureau and populate it with bureaucrats of a political hue than it is to put an end to the agency and send the political patronage boys back home. It is really an old story to observers here and, I believe, all of them recognize how difficult if not dangerous it is going to be to dynamite the alphabetical agencies out of existence.

Some of them undoubtedly have served and are serving a useful purpose. Undoubtedly, some of them were needed long before Mr. Roosevelt brought his New Deal to Washington. Instead of that fact making the wrecking job easier, it makes the job more difficult. It is very hard to convince plum pickers that their job is a temporary one, even though they were so informed when they were appointed. It is more difficult to convince that type of individual that their agency is not all-important or that it is of less consequence than a neighboring agency bearing another set of alphabetical letters.

In addition, the plum pickers have their patronage backers at the capital. The representatives and senators interested in building up their own political machines back home naturally put people in the political jobs who will be most helpful in assisting that particular representative or senator to be re-elected. Thus, it becomes rather obvious that even if Mr. Roosevelt seriously tries to liquidate the various alphabetical bureaus, boards, commissions and administrations, he has a man-sized task on his hands. If by chance a Republican should be elected and Mr. Roosevelt retired to private life, he, too, will find himself criticized, cajoled and threatened when he seeks to squeeze the water out of this structure known as government which was expanded so much in Mr. Roosevelt's plans to meet the emergency.

Long, Hard Task

Frankly, I believe it will take the full four years of the next President's term to unseat all of the excess job holders and eliminate from the government all of the surplus alphabetical agencies. In the very nature of things it cannot be done more quickly. The answer lies in the fact that these agencies embark upon ambitious programs that cannot be halted. The government becomes committed to certain propositions and, except in war time, most of them must be executed. So, however you examine the situation, Uncle Sam is well hooked.

To illustrate how difficult is the job of getting rid of a government agency after it is once established, one need not go further than the late NRA. Six or seven months have elapsed since the Supreme court unanimously clipped the wings of the famed Blue Eagle. That decision did the work of wrecking NRA as completely as a bombshell can wreck a boat when a direct hit is scored. But, whether you realize it or not, we still have in Washington an NRA organization of almost 2,500 employees. It is true that number is probably only about one-fourth of the total number on the NRA pay roll when General "Crack-Down" Johnson was at the helm and guiding the flight of the Blue Eagle but it was assumed at least that the Supreme court decision made payments for the NRA pay roll illegal at the same time. However, it has happened that the administration has found money some place with which to pay this regiment of employees who, as far as most observers in Washington can ascertain, have very little constructive work to do.

The organization has no official status except such as is given it by Mr. Roosevelt's various executive orders. It has no authority. Anything it does or says has no more force than a zephyr. Yet thousands of dollars are being paid its workers on the first and fifteenth of every month—and there is no sign that these payments will be ended soon.

For another example let us go back to the war days. In order to successfully prosecute America's part in the World war, the government took over and operated the railroads. A gigantic organization was built up here in Washington and representatives of the railroad administration were scattered far and wide throughout the country. Commitments were made that continue even to this day. Credit in the form of government loans was extended to the rail lines and several hundred million dollars of that amount remains uncollected to this day. And with all, after 18 years we still have a railroad administration operating in Washington at government expense.

Another wartime agency about which little is heard but which still is in existence is the War Finance corporation. It floated bonds and made loans to private interests and those commitments have forced retention of a skeleton organization that probably must be continued for several years yet before the job of liquidation is complete.

One could go on and on in illustrating how a government agency becomes a parasite on the government structure to remain, long after its usefulness has ceased, a burden on the taxpayers. It is hardly any wonder then with the knowledge of what has happened in the case of other governmental agencies that there is a question of how long it will be before the present emergency alphabet can be eliminated. It is likewise a matter of concern what the total cost is going to be before the mess is finally eradicated.

Thumbs Down on NRA

We have had evidence lately of how efforts are initiated to maintain these agencies even when they are legally dead. Recently in Washington there was held a much ballyhooed meeting to which some three thousand representatives of business interests were invited. It was called by George L. Berry, the top man in what is left of the NRA structure. The purpose was to find out what business wanted in the way of a revived NRA. Business did not want NRA revived and the meeting turned out to be a genuine flop. There was nothing like three thousand representatives in attendance and the meeting itself gave a good many persons the impression of being staged for the benefit of the American Federation of Labor, to which the old NRA catered.

Mr. Berry, until lately the head of one of the large union labor organizations, did not convince business that it needed more governmental interference, Indeed, if business went away convinced of anything beyond the fact that Mr. Berry's meeting was a flop, it left Washington with a deep feeling that it did not want NRA in any form nor did it want any other governmental agency messing around with its efforts to get back on its feet.

The circumstance illustrates better than anything I know how parasitic agencies in the government seek to perpetuate themselves. One must realize in considering such a condition that all of those employees obviously want to keep their jobs.

In the case of the attempted revival of NRA, the political factor is important. Mr. Roosevelt said, it will be remembered, that when NRA was organized it must be regarded as something of an experiment and that if the experiment failed to work, he would be the first to say so. He has not made that announcement yet for, it is considered, if he admitted that the NRA experiment failed to work he would be admitting defeat for one of his earlier pet projects right in the face of a Presidential campaign. Politicians do not like to make admissions of this kind.

Business Fights Back

It will be recalled as well that after the Supreme court held the business codes of NRA to be unconstitutional and the business codes were the vitals of the NRA structure, there was much pressure exerted on congress from the White House for reconstruction of some sort of a program to succeed NRA. Business did not want it any more then than it does now and it fought back while the legislation was pending. The result was that congress passed a law permitting lines of commerce and industry to organize and frame their own voluntary codes.

Jurisdiction of these codes was placed in the Federal Trade commission. That agency was supposed to work in co-operation with business and to exercise a judicial function in determining when the codes were properly within existing laws against monopoly.

The Trade commission in the last year has blossomed forth as a rather sound agency in its consultations with business and, I believe, merits the respect which business generally has for it. But with all of that respect and the knowledge that the Trade commission tries to be fair, only five lines of industry have presented codes of fair practice for commission approval.

The details of the futile attempt to breathe life back into the Blue Eagle have been related at this length to show what the future holds in the way of barnacles on our structure of government. If we have many more the result is liable to be a cancer and a cancer thus far has proved incurable.

What Class of People Pays Its Bills Most Promptly?

After an exhaustive survey that reached into every corner of the nation, Prof Paul D. Converse of the University of Illinois, in collaboration with the National Association of Finance Companies, has found the answer in this question. Office clerks, with a percentage of 92 per cent, it is disclosed, lead the list.

Trailing them, in terms of approximate percentage, are the following: Storekeepers, 89; school teachers, 85; dentists, 82; doctors, 80; nurses, 79; lawyers, 61; mechanics and tenant farmers, 60; policemen and firemen, 58; common labor and hotel employees, 47; barbers and truck drivers, 45; painters and decorators, 38.—G. Childlikeness Which Is Highest Gain of Humanity

There is a childhood into which we have to grow, just as there is a childhood which we must leave behind; a childlikeness which is the highest gain of humanity, and a childishness from which but few of those who are counted the wisest among men, have freed themselves in their imagined progress towards the reality of things.—George McDonald.

SYNOPSIS

The future of the still youthful and comely "Widder" Marcia Howe, recently released by death from her idling, selfish husband, is a conversational tit-bit among housewives of the little hamlet of Wilton. Eligible bachelors and widowers also are interested. Marcia, despite her unfortunate matrimonial experience, finds pleasure in her life, but is lonely at times, and has invited her late husband's niece, Sylvia Hayden, whom she has never seen, to visit her. The girl arrives and Marcia takes to her at once, while Sylvia, expecting to see a somewhat elderly aunt, finds Marcia more like a sister.

"You didn't bring a trunk! But you are to make a long visit, child."

"I—I wasn't sure that I'd want to," Sylvia replied. "You see I was a wee bit afraid of you. I had no idea what you were like. If I'd brought my things, I'd have been obliged to stay."

"You're a cautious young person," was Marcia's dry observation. "'Twould serve you right if I sent you home at the end of a fortnight."

"Oh, please don't do that," begged Sylvia. "It's in the Alton City Courier that I have gone east to visit relatives for a few weeks. If I should come right back, everybody would decide I'd stolen the family silver or done something disgraceful. Besides—my trunk is all packed, locked, strapped and I've brought the key," added she with disarming frankness. "It can be sent for in case—"

"I see!" nodded Marcia, her lips curving into a smile in spite of herself, "I said you were cautious."

"Don't you ever watch your own step?"

As the myriad pros and cons she had weighed and eliminated before inviting her guest passed in quick review before Marcia's mind, she chuckled:

"Sometimes I do," she conceded frimly.

CHAPTER III

The village store, grandiloquently styled by a red sign the Wilton emporium, was thronged with the usual noontime crowd.

It was a still, gray day, murky with fog, and the odors of wet oilskins, steaming rubber coats, damp woolens blended with a mixture of tar, coffee and tobacco smoke, made its interior thick and stuffy. Long ago the air-tight stove had consumed such remnants of oxygen as the room contained. The windows reeked with moisture; the floor was gritty with sand.

These discomforts, however, failed to be of consequence to the knot of men who, rain or shine, congregated there at mail time. They were accustomed to them. Indeed, a drizzle, far from keeping the habitues away, rendered the meeting place unusually popular.

Shuffling over to the counter where his friends were huddled, Zenas Henry unostentatiously joined them.

"Yes, siree, there'll be somethin' doin' in Wilton now," Enoch Morton, the fish-man, was saying. "That sand bar's goin' to be the center of the town, if I don't miss my guess. There'll be more'n Charlie Eldridge fishin' in the channel."

A laugh greeted the prediction.

"Who's seen her?" Captain Benjamin Todd inquired.

"I have," came the piping voice of Lemuel Gill. "Me and 'Becca rowed over from Belleport Saturday. The girl's Jason's niece all right, same's folks say, though she looks no more like him than chalk like cheese. A prettier little critter 'twould be hard to find. And she's head over heels in love with the place. I'm almighty glad she's come, too, for it's goin' to be grand for Marcia, who must be lonely enough out there with only the setter for company."

"It's her own fault. She could have other companions was she so minded," declared Captain Phineas Taylor, significantly.

"Oh, we all know that, Phineas," agreed the gentle Lemuel Gill. "There's plenty of folks hankerin' to be comrades to Marcia. The only trouble is she doesn't want 'em."

"With this girl at her elbow, she'll want 'em even less, I reckon," Asaph Holmes interposed.

"Mebbe. Still, I figger that ain't a-goin' to discourage her admirers none. Why, within the week Sylvia's been here, I happen to know Marcia's had four buckets of clams, a catch of flounders, an' a couple of cuts of swordfish presented to her," Ephriam Wise, the mail carrier announced.

"That stray blue-fish of Charlie Eldridge's must 'a' swelled the collection some, too," put in Lemuel. "When I asked Charlie what he done with it, he owned he left it over at the Homestead. He said he never wanted to see another fish long's he lived."

"That ain't all the gifts The Widder's had, neither," volunteered Silas Nickerson, the postmaster, who now joined the group. "More'n one lobster's been sneaked to Marcia after dusk."

"I don't so much mind folks makin' Marcia friendly donations," Captain Jonas Baker declared with guilty haste. "In my opinion, it's right an' proper they should. But when it comes to Eleazer Crocker, who's head of the fire department an' undertaker as well, goin' over there for the entire evenin' with the keys to the engine house in his pocket, I think the town oughter take some action 'bout it. S'pose there was to be a fire an' him hemmed in by the tide t'other side the channel? The whole village might burn to the ground 'fore ever he could be fetched home."

"Well, anyhow, I'm glad this niece of Marcia's come," broke in Lemuel Gill. "She's a pleasant little critter an' will kinder stir things up."

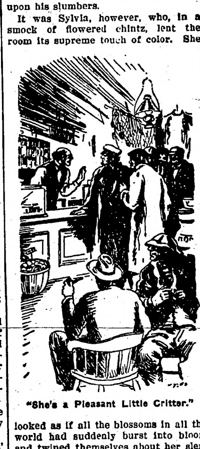
"Oh, there's no danger but she'll do that all right, Lemmy," Zenas Henry drawled. "You can generally depend on a pretty girl to raise a rumpus. Give her a month in town an' she'll most likely have all the male population cuttin' one another's throats."

Fortunately both Marcia and Sylvia were at the moment too far out of earshot for this menacing prediction to reach them. Cut off by curtains of fog and a tide that foamed through the channel, they were standing in the Homestead kitchen.

It was a room boasting space enough for an old-fashioned brick oven; an oil stove; two sand-scrubbed tables, snow white and smooth as satin; a high-backed rocker cushioned in red calico; braided rugs and shelves for plants. A regal kitchen truly—one that bespoke both comfort and hospitality.

Before the fire, stretched upon his side, lay Prince Hal, his body relaxed, his eyes drowsy with sleep; while from her vantage-ground on the rocking chair above, the tiger kitten, Winkie-Wee, gazed watchfully down upon his slumbers.

It was Sylvia, however, who, in a smock of flowered chintz, lent the room its supreme touch of color. She looked as if all the blossoms in all the world had suddenly burst into bloom and twined themselves about her slender body.



"She's a Pleasant Little Critter."

With her coming, a new world had opened to Marcia. To see Sylvia jauntily sweep aside old conventions; to behold the different emphasis she put upon familiar problems; to witness her audacious belittling of issues her elders had been wont to grapple with was an experience that continually shocked, stimulated, challenged and amused.

Marcia found herself half reluctantly admiring this splendidly normal outlook; this mixture of sophistication and naivete; her niece's novel and definitely formed opinions.

For, youthful though Sylvia was, she had personality, character, stratums of wisdom far in advance of her years. A very intriguing companion, Marcia admitted, one of whose many-sidedness she would not soon tire.

"Now what shall our menu be, Marcia, dear?" she was asking. "Remember, according to our compact, it is my turn to get the dinner."

"Anything but fish!" Marcia answered with a groan. "I'm so tired of salt-water products it seems as if never again could I touch another."

"But my dear, if you will have a stag line of nautical admirers, what can you expect? You must pay the penalty. Besides, I think you're ungrateful," Sylvia pouted. "I love clams and other sea foods."

"You've not had so many of them in your lifetime as I have. Besides, I suspect you are not telling the truth. Come, confess. Aren't you a wee bit fed up on clams? Clam chowder Monday night, steamed clams Tuesday noon; clam fritters Tuesday night. And then that bluefish. Why, it was big as a shark! I used to think it would be romantic to be a Lorelei and live deep down beneath the waves; but this avalanche of fish—!" Despairingly she shrugged her shoulders.

Sylvia laughed.

"I don't feel at all like that. I've had a feast of fish and enjoyed it. But if I were to express a preference it would be for the hard-shelled suitors. Do select one of those for a husband, Marcia," begged she, whimsically. "The others are all very well. Indeed, that bluefish swain was magnificent in his way, but me for the crustaceans."

"Sylvia! You absurd child!"

"Just consider the clam character for a moment—so silent, so close-mouthed; never stirring up trouble or wanting to be out nights. In my opinion, he would be an ideal helpmate. Not sensitive, either; nor jealous. Marcia, do marry one of the clams!"

"Sylvia, you are ridiculous!" Marcia protested. "You forget I am your aunt."

"My mistake. I did forget it, I'll confess; and what's more I probably always shall. To me you are just a girl I'd be head-over-heels in love with if I were a man. I don't blame all the clams, lobsters, and flounders for flocking over here to make love to you."

"Stop talking nonsense."

"But it isn't nonsense. It's the truth. You certainly are not deluding yourself into thinking these men come gallivanting out here over the flats with the mere philanthropic purpose of seeing you don't starve to death, do you?" Sylvia demanded.

"Perhaps they come to see you," hedged Marcia feebly.

"Me! Now Marcia, pray do not resort to deceit and attempt to poke this legion of mermen off on me. As a relative, I insist on having a truthful, respectable aunt. Consider my youth. Isn't it your Christian duty to set me a good example? Whether you wed any of these nautical worshipers or not is your own affair. But at least honesty compels you to acknowledge they're your property."

A shadow, fleet as the rift in a summer cloud, passed over Marcia's face, but transient as it was Sylvia, sensitively attuned and alert to changes of mood in others, noticed it.

"What a little beast I am, Marcia," she cried, throwing her arm impulsively about the other woman. "Forgive my thoughtlessness. I wouldn't have hurt you for the world. You know I never saw Uncle Jason. He left home when I was a child and is no reality to me. Even mother remembered him only as he was when a boy. Mother felt sorry, hurt, that Uncle Jason should have left home as he did, and never come back to see her. He was an impulsive, hot-headed boy and she said he resented her watchfulness and authority. But even though he ran away in a moment of anger, one would think years of absence would have smoothed away his resentment."

"Jason—Jason loved your mother," Marcia murmured in a voice scarcely audible. "I am sure of that."

"But if he loved her, why didn't he come to see her? I know it was a long journey, but if he could only have come once—just once. It would have meant so much!"

"Men are selfish—unfeeling. They forget," replied Marcia, bitterly. "You give your life to them and they toss aside your love and devotion as if it were so much rubbish."

What did she know of Jason, that dim heritage of her childhood? Of Marcia? Of their life together, she suddenly asked herself.

To cover the awkwardness of the moment, she bent to caress Prince Hal who had risen and stood, alert and listening beside her.

Only an instant passed before Marcia spoke again—this time with visible effort to recapture her customary manner.

"Suppose we have lobster Newburg this noon," suggested she. "I'll get the chafing-dish. What's the matter, Hal, old man? You look worried. Don't tell me you hear more fish swimming our way?"

The nose of the setter quivered and, going to the window, he growled.

"He does hear something," asserted Sylvia. "What do you suppose it is?"

"Gulls, most likely. They circle above the house in clouds," was Marcia's careless answer. "The Prince regards them as his natural enemies. He delights to chase them up the beach and send them whirling into the air. Apparently he resents their chatter."

Again the dog growled.

Almost immediately a hand fumbled with the latch, and as the door swung open, a man staggered blindly into the room.

He was hatless, wet to the skin, and shivering with cold, and before Marcia could reach his side, he lurched forward and fell at her feet.

"Quick, Sylvia, close the door and heat some broth. The poor fellow is exhausted. He's chilled to the bone."

"Who is he?"

"No one I know—a stranger. Bring that pillow and help me to slip it under his head. We'll let him rest where he is a moment."

Her fingers moved to the bronzed wrist.

A sweater of blue wool, a blue serge suit, socks of tan and sport shoes to match them clung to the tall, slender figure, and on the hand lying across it sparkled a diamond sunk in a band of wrought gold.

It was not the hand of a fisherman, tanned though it was; nor yet that of a sailor. There could be no doubt about that. Rather, it belonged to a scholar, a writer, a painter, or possibly to a physician, for it was strong as well as beautifully formed.

Sylvia bent to adjust the pillow, and her eyes and Marcia's met.

Who was this man?

Whence came he?

"He's a chip off the old block," you say, little realizing, perhaps, how squarely you are hitting the nail on the head. According to an article in the Parents' Magazine, "Not only in matters of temperament can the origin of a child's problem be traced to the parent but in the realm of attitudes there is very often a definite relationship."

"The major problems of divorce, discordant homes, widowhood, illness and other serious situations are reflected in the maladjustments of the children," in the opinion of Helen Sargent, supervisor of the psychological clinic, Northwestern university. Admitting that the roots and branches of such problems are so far reaching that each requires extensive study and individual solution, Miss Sargent declares:

"There are many less apparent connections between the ways in which adult members of the household choose for meeting their lives and certain trends which appear in youngsters."

High-Tensioned Mother.

The psychologist calls our attention to the "little terror" in the home, whose mother has been warned he has a nervous temperament and must not be overstimulated. She follows expert advice to the letter—makes him rest before going to bed, forbids him exciting radio programs, etc. But Sonny continues to grind his teeth, toss in bed, to "raise cain" in general during the day hours. Miss Sargent asks us to watch his mother in action:

"With studied quiet she asks him to stop banging on the table while she is telephoning, then in a voice tense with annoyance tells the grocer what she thinks of the peas he sent yesterday. She arranges a simple routine for her son but herself rushes from one task to the next, creating an atmosphere of crackling electricity wherever she moves."

Mother, Daughter Egocentric.

Dorothy's another example. Miss Sargent points out the poor child simply can't or won't make friends and it worries mother. Yet mother confesses:

"I never have liked many people . . . When I'm with a group, I always wish to get back home . . . I don't miss people . . . I have my family."

Miss Sargent's theory is that if mother is to find out what's wrong with Dorothy, she must search her own character. "Mother must determine why her life has become so egocentric that she is content to do without friendly contacts that are a vital part of the life of the average human being."

The article clears up a number of points which must puzzle plenty of parents. Its theme song is, before you try to guide your child, you must be able to govern yourself. You must meet your own problems and find a solution or you simply can't map out the program that will benefit your offspring.

Modern Methods Upset Old-Fashioned Fairy Tales

Fruits in Winter No Longer a Problem

IT used to be that when a writer of fairy tales wanted a good story situation he had a cruel stepmother ordering her child to gather strawberries in midwinter, or a wicked witch demanding cherries when the snow lay white on the ground.

The adventures of the hero in getting himself out of this difficult situation composed the action of the story. Today, ten cents or so, and a corner grocery store would do the trick, and curtail the story.

But if you think that this matter of fruits out of season was a problem only of ancient times, it may be interesting to know that if your grandmother had casually remarked to your grandfather, one winter day, that they were going to have peaches for dinner—he would probably have called a doctor to see if all was well with grandmother. It was not until the Civil War that canned foods became known, and even then they were difficult to get and the varieties were so limited that they were not generally used.

Canners Make Intensive Study

And while these first canned foods were a boon to the soldiers during the Civil War, they did not compare with the delicious-tasting canned foods which are available today. An intensive study of methods of growing fruits and vegetables, as well as methods of canning them has been responsible for the great strides which canners have made in three generations.

Long before the plow is stuck into the ground, canners have been at work to make the can of peas which you open for your dinner, the finest tasting peas possible. They have entered into contracts with the farmers, studied their soil conditions, and in many cases supplied them their seed. They send experts to help them during the growing season so that the crops will be handled in such a way as to produce the best crop.

When the crop is ready, the canners provide means for quick harvesting, transporting and preparing for the cannery. Modern scientific methods of canning these foods are well known, and the best proof of their efficiency is the high quality of the product, —with which we are all so familiar.

Varieties of Vegetables

Did you know that there were more than sixty-five varieties of canned vegetables? Every grocer, of course, does not carry every variety. While the average grocer carries those for which there is the greatest demand — such as tomatoes, corn, peas, beans, asparagus, etc.—you will find by looking around a little that you can also buy artichoke buds, Brussels sprouts, tiny, whole white potatoes, sweet potatoes, beets sliced or diced, baby carrots whole or diced, and the various strained vegetables which are so delicious and so convenient for preparing dishes which call for purée.

It is not only at seasons when fresh fruits and vegetables are not possible that the housewife uses these tender, delicious canned products. There are many times in midsummer when the vegetable markets show so-called fresh vegetables which are limp and wilted from long processes of transportation, or from drying out on the display shelves in the store, that the housewife prefers to buy these same fruit and vegetable varieties, always fresh and full-flavored in cans.*

GOOD NEWS—OYSTERS!

FOR oyster lovers there is excellent news. The 1934-35 "set" of oysters have been proclaimed the best since the famous "set" of 1930. Good news, also, for thousands of unemployed is the fact that the oyster industry will, this year, employ 50,000 persons "a-sea and a-shore."

Fortunately for oyster-lovers, science has discovered that the bivalve not only tastes excellent, but is excellent for health. The composition of the oyster is of such a character as to make it, more nearly than most foods, self-sufficient as a diet. In this respect it resembles milk and needs but the ordinary ingredients used in cooking — starches and fats — to give it balance. An oyster stew, for example, generously seasoned with butter and accompanied by the usual bowl of oyster crackers is a perfectly balanced meal.

Convenience of Canned Oysters

While the old theory that oysters could be eaten only in months with an R has been discredited, it is still a fact that they are not generally available in other months, owing to the inferior taste of the oyster during the season of spawning. With the advent of canned oysters—oysters taken from the best waters at the time they are fittest—it has become possible to eat this excellent food all year round. This is a long step from Roman days when the oysters were shipped from Britain and had to be packed in sacks of snow, so that the shells were held together, keeping the oysters wet and fresh in their own liquid. The convenience of canned oysters has, no doubt, added materially to the quantity of oysters used.

A Stew and an Entrée

Oyster Stew: Scald three cups of milk in a double boiler. Heat the contents of a 5-ounce can of oysters to just below the boiling point and add to the scalded milk. Bind with one tablespoon of butter which has been rubbed together with one tablespoon flour; season with one teaspoon salt and a little paprika. Then add one-fourth cup of cream. Serve at once with oyster crackers. This serves four persons.

Oyster Entrée: Drain the contents of one 5-ounce can of oysters and arrange in four buttered flat shallow earthen ramekins, or in scallop shells. Mix one cup of bread crumbs with one tablespoon of minced parsley, two tablespoons butter, one-half teaspoon salt, a few grains of pepper, one-fourth teaspoon thyme and one-half teaspoon lemon juice. Add four tablespoons oyster liquor to moisten. Cover the oysters with this and place under the broiler flame until the crumbs are well browned. This serves four persons.

On Toast and in Patties

Oysters a la Maryland: Brown one and one-half tablespoons butter in a pan, add one and one-half tablespoons flour and brown again. Then add one and one-half cups of milk slowly, stirring until smooth. Add three teaspoons anchovy paste, one-half teaspoon salt and a few grains of paprika. Scald the oysters from a 5-ounce can of oysters, reserving the liquor, and arrange on buttered toast. Add the oyster liquor to the sauce. Then add one slightly-beaten egg yolk, stir until hot and pour over the oysters. This makes four servings.

Chicken and Oyster Patties: Make a cream sauce of one and one-half tablespoons butter, one and one-half tablespoons flour, one cup of thin cream, one-half teaspoon salt, one-eighth teaspoon celery salt and a little paprika. Add one-fourth cup of canned pimientos which have been shredded, oysters which have been scalded in their own liquor from a 5-ounce can, and two cups of diced chicken. Serve at once in patty shells. This fills six to eight patties.*

St. Paul, Minnesota.—When daddy goes a hunting for a rabbit skin to "wrap his baby bunting in" he is running the risk of contracting tularemia.

Winter hunters are especially warned by members of the Public Health Education Committee of the Minnesota State Medical Association, today, therefore, to take special precautionary measures against it.

Extensive studies made at the University of Minnesota have shown that tularemia is widespread among small animals of the woods. Rabbits, squirrels, mice, quail, sage hens are all subject to it. Unfortunately humans are susceptible, too, if the blood of any of these creatures comes in contact with an abrasion or small cut on the skin. And it is a very serious, often a fatal disease.

It is spread by two common routes. One is by handling infected animals. The rabbit hunter who handles dead rabbits with bare hands is running a grave risk. Stout gloves are absolutely necessary for safety. Cooking kills the germ, however, and so does freezing.

The other route of infection is by way of tick or other insect bites. It is by tick that the disease is carried from animal to animal and several instances of fatal tularemia are on record among humans who have been bitten by ticks. This danger is obviously to be thought of especially during the warm weather.

In any case, a rabbit's foot or tail may bring very bad luck indeed if the rabbit is sick with tularemia and Minnesotans are recommended by the doctors to choose horseshoes for lucky pieces.

How State's 'Pit' Lakes Were Formed

Minneapolis.—How the so-called "pit" lakes of Minnesota, including many in the immediate neighborhood of Brainerd, such as Gull Lake, were formed, is one of many interesting details on the early geological history of Minnesota given in the volume, "Upper Mississippi River in Late Wisconsin and Postglacial Times," recently published by Professor W. S. Cooper of the University of Minnesota. One glacier had nearly melted, he explains, leaving domes of ice here and there, when another advanced, covering these domes with sand and detritus. When the second glacier melted and the earlier ice was again exposed it melted and left a hole where the ice had prevented filling by action of the later glacier. These holes promptly filled with water and became "pit" lakes.

Dr. Cooper takes issue in this book with the idea that the great sand plain extending across much of Anoka and Isanti counties from near St. Cloud to the St. Croix river was formed by the action of wind. At various places on the surface of the plain, he admits, there are sand dunes of considerable extent. But he produces evidence that has convinced him that the sand plain itself was deposited as outwash of waters from retreating glaciers in central Minnesota.

His book shows that at one time the present Mississippi was a tributary of the Minnesota River and at another of the St. Croix. Each of these had a great glacial lake at its head which maintained a huge colume of flow even after the nearer ice was melted, but when these lakes, Agassiz to the west and Duluth to the east, subsided, there was a better natural water source at the headwaters of the Mississippi, and it became the dominant stream.

He explains the way in which the Mississippi selected its course between Brainerd and the Twin Cities. "On one side was a huge morainy or mound of earth left by the glacier, while to the east was the great ice sheet itself. The melting water from the sheet had no choice but to cut a channel between these two, and that came to be the present channel of the Mississippi river as far as Minneapolis. The book was produced by the University of Minnesota Press.

3,000 Miles of Road Improved in 1936

The Minnesota highway department improved the condition of more than 3,000 miles of trunk highways in 1935, according to a summary of the year's work announced by Commissioner N. W. Elsberg.

The improvements included: Grading, 228 miles; regrading, 42 miles; new graveling, 162 miles; regraveling 450 miles; new bituminous treatments, 318 miles; bituminous re-treatments, 1,440 miles; bituminous shoulder treatment, 85 miles; plant mix bituminous surfacing, 78 miles; concrete paving completed or under contract, 103 miles; subgrade treatment, 87 miles; gravel lifts, 10 miles; dust laying treatment, 130 miles.

The department also constructed more than 50 bridges and eliminated 39 railway grade crossings.

More than 60 roadside development projects increasing the beauty and safety of the highways were carried out. These were largely done as relief labor projects or with other special federal funds. Civilian Conservation corps camps co-operated with the department in a considerable amount of this work.

The projects included obliteration of construction scars, widening of shoulders, flattening and seeding of slopes, construction of roadside parking areas and co-operation with local communities in developing park sites along highways.

Grygla Dedicates New Light Plant Saturday

A large crowd attended the dedication of the new municipal light plant at Grygla on Saturday evening, January 11. Besides several musical numbers, Judge M. A. Brattland spoke on the Development of Light. Mr. Fladeland of Grygla demonstrated the development of lighting from the torch to the present lighting system.

In his address, Judge Brattland pointed out that co-operative effort on the part of the people to join themselves together for mutual service had resulted in the new lighting system for the Grygla community and showed how co-operative effort could solve all our problems, both economic and otherwise, if we would set our minds to it. The program was followed by a dance with music furnished by Shorty Davidson and his orchestra.

The season of 1935 was not very favorable for the production of reliable agricultural seeds. For this reason the farmers of the north central states, Minnesota and neighboring territory, should be very careful when buying their supply for this spring's sowing. Germination, purity, and weed seeds are the three factors most to be watched, the State department of Agriculture advises in a bulletin this week.

Germination of corn, wheat and barley suffered the most. Seed corn, on the average, is very poor in germination. Iowa and Illinois, northern Missouri and territories bordering these states are in a very bad way. Minnesota is better off, but tests at the State Seed Testing Laboratory indicate that the best average test will be 80 percent, or possibly lower, the department says.

Every farmer should make his own germination. If in doubt as to how this may be done, send a postal card to the Extension Division, University Farm, St. Paul, Minnesota, and ask for directions for making germination tests of corn, both for bulk and for individual ear tests. If individual ear tests ever were important, they are right now. Certainly, the State Seed Testing Laboratory will make tests, but indications now point strongly toward congestion of the facilities for germination and for purity analysis work. Therefore, home testing of corn, which can easily and cheaply be made, is advisable. Test your corn now and again in April, for some corn will lose vitality between now and planting time.

For the most part, wheat and barley tested now will be a safe indication of germination next March and April, but if there is a noticeable number of weak, spindly sprouts and slow germination, a retest next March is recommended. Don't think that because your wheat is 50, 55 or 58 pounds per bushel grain, it is O. K. for germination. The State Laboratory tests to date show no correlation whatever between weight per bushel and germination percentage.

Wheat, barley and oats can readily be tested at home. Count out 200 or more seeds, put them in a "rag doll" or "plate" tester, keep them moist and in 5 or 7 or 10 days your seed sprouting value is determined. Get in touch with your County Agent for details in making seed selections, germination and counting.

Lastly, we caution everybody who buys and who sows seeds to be more than particular about getting and sowing any kind of seed without first finding out the weed seed content. Creeping Jennie, especially, must be avoided. About ten other primary noxious weeds must be guarded against. Read the label attached to each container of seeds of one pound or more. If the label is not satisfactory as the law requires, don't buy, says the bulletin.

A new attendance record was established at the Northwest School last week when a large group of new students brought the total for the year to 359 as compared with the previous record of 358 during the year 1929-30. As additional students are expected to report this week, Registrar J. W. Eldmar anticipates a total of over 400 for the year. The marked increase in attendance has overtaxed the available dormitory and classroom accommodation.

Winter term activities include the many contests and meetings in which Northwest School students will take part during Winter Shows Week February 3 to 7; School of Agriculture triangular debate contest; basketball tournament, and weekly assemblies and special entertainments. The winter term will close the last week in March.

The Brewery Press Threatens Henry Ford

By W. G. Calderwod

The brewery industry has a husky grouch against Henry Ford. The man of industrial fame felt that the little city of Dearborn, where the main Ford plant is located, ought to have additional recreational facilities, and to supply that need he deeded a plot of 20 acres to the city for a park and playground. Thus far the act was a bit of Ford philanthropy, and a contribution to the wholesome outdoor life of the community. Not so bad.

But in making the deed of gift he inserted a clause providing that intoxicating liquor, including beer, should never be sold in the park. That would mean that there would be 20 acres of space in Michigan where the breweries could never legally establish a saloon. Stated proportionally, one acre out of every 1,839,360 in the state of Michigan would be Forditutionally dry. Not so good.

So the brewing industry plans to invoke "economic sanctions." The WEST COAST BREWER states it like this:

"Perhaps the brewing industry will know how most emphatically to show its [illegible] of Mr. Ford's action. The League of Nations has indicated what effect the application of economic sanctions [illegible] or to peace. It is possible the [illegible] dustry may invoke economic sanctions in the case of Mr. Ford."

The [illegible] makes even a more direct threat. It observes, editorially:

"Brewery workers are customers of the kind of cars Mr. Ford turns out. At present, however, there are other makes in the same price class, all of them are [illegible], but only Ford is anti-brewing industry."

It seems petty for the brewery press to get all het and bothered over so trivial a matter. This is particularly true since some states provide that no liquor, including beer, shall be sold within a radius of [illegible] of the state university, or within [illegible] a mile of any institution of higher learning, and many cities prohibit liquor sales within a specified distance of a church, [illegible].

This vindictive intolerance of sa[illegible] upon the liquor industry, which industry is not particularly necessary to the social well-being of the nation, does not help to build up the public good will which the traffic so sorely needs.

Permanent Relief Setup Necessary: Zimmerman

Minnesota will have a relief problem for many years to come and the state should start now to study plans for a permanent relief organization and program, L. P. Zimmerman, SERA administrator, has notified the special session of the state legislature.

Mr. Zimmerman asked the legislature to authorize the state executive council to conduct a statewide survey to ascertain definitely the relief needs for a period of years and to appropriate not less than $100,000 to make the survey possible.

"Such a survey should be conducted in each of the state's 87 counties," Mr. Zimmerman said. "It should obtain first hand information regarding local condition industries, maximum and minimum possible employment, and the maximum ability of each county to provide for its relief needs.

"The survey should include a definite examination of persons who are receiving relief, who are unemployables and who may be classified as institutional cases, the prevailing social standards in each instance and the relationship between dependency and neglect and other social problems.

"The survey should include a definite chart and plan for a permanent organization to deal with all public welfare programs in the state; a plan for efficient administration and for definite allocation of responsibilities in connection with all welfare work."

"Long-time relief programs are now being studied in many states and the proposed survey in Minnesota undoubtedly would lead to adoption of a comprehensive, intelligent and constructive program on a long time basis and would materially assist in meeting Minnesota's relief problem, which appears to be a permanent one," Mr. Zimmerman said.

The Original Milk of Magnesia Wafers

With the Minnesota Lawmakers

With the liberals bombarding the committee's pension bill with provisions designed to increase its dispensary provisions, and with the more conservative members just as firm in their resolution to stick by the majority presentation, the state senate tossed the old age pension ball into the think of the legislative fray.

Moving into the final phases of pension consideration, the senate approved four changes in the bill and rejected four others. Approved were measures to give government agencies a common claim on the estate of deceased pensioners in the amount of benefits paid, to require pensioners to reside in their home counties at least a year before applying, and to permit temporary change of counties without loss of benefit.

In rapid succession, amendments designed to place management of the pension system under the state board of control and to increase the minimum from $35 to $45 a month were voted down by sizeable majorities.

The first amendment, proposed by Sen. B. G. Novak, St. Paul, recommended that the state and federal governments bear the entire cost of the pension distribution instead of forcing a portion of the cost on the county as the committee bill proposes. Senator Charles N. Orr of the capital city urged the defeat of this amendment, stating that a state controlled system would encourage payment of pension to persons who did not actually need it.

Financing of the pensions continued to lurk in the background as a possible subject of disagreement between the house and the senate. A house sub-committee was working on a bill designed to put an extra two million dollars into the general revenue fund to permit that fund to finance pensions without adding to the one million dollar load already put on real estate. The bill, in rough form, included 25 per cent surtaxes on individual and corporate incomes, a five mill corporate excess tax, a surtax on inheritances, a gift tax, and additional taxes on liquor and telephone, freight line, sleeping car and express company gross earnings, all to expire after one year's operation.

Additions to the tentative revenue bill were announced by Rep. W. R. Youngquist, Minneapolis, chairman of the subcommittee drawing up the measure. New taxes, inserted since the first drafting of the bill, he said, are the liquor tax, which advances levies from 60 cents to $1 a gallon and the gross earnings taxes.

The telephone tax would leave the present 4 per cent rate in effect on local exchange business in fourth class cities and other towns of less than 10,000, but would advance it to 6 per cent on all toll business and on exchange business in the larger towns and the metropolitan centers. The increases proposed on freight, sleeping car, and express company earnings are the same as those proposed in the much discussed omnibus bill.

The senate is hanging back on the definite financing discussion until the pension takes more definite shape. Senator A. J. Rockne, Zumbrota, has suggested that an outstanding two million dollar debt of the highway department to the general revenue fund be paid off next year to bear most of the pension load.

Without a dissenting vote, the house speedily approved the tax bill designed to permit property owners to pay their delinquent taxes in installments. The measure applies to all property taxes delinquent in 1933 and before, and is aimed at encouraging repayment of all or part of the $85,000,000 taxes that are unpaid in the state.

Active interest of the legislature in the recent turmoil over labor disputes and the spread of crime in the state was indicated again by the announcement of Edwin L. Lindell, executive secretary of the Minnesota Law and Order league. Eight bills for curbing crime will be submitted to the legislature if the special session continue long enough and the members care to discuss such matters, Lindell said.

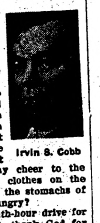
The bills would include measures to give the prosecution in criminal cases the final plea of the jury, to transfer some duties from the pardon to the parole board, to adopt the uniform extradition act to give police and sheriffs in adjoining states the right to cross state lines when in full pursuit of criminals, to require registration of guests and motor vehicles in tourist and cabin camps, and to increase penalties for drunken driving.

Debate over the Novak proposed waged hot and heavy for a few hours with Sen. H. C. Steining, Moorhead, drawing considerable interest with his survey of the same sort of system as used in Ohio. In the Buckeye state, Steining said, the situation has become so bad that the governor has called for an investigation. Eighteen months after Ohio adopted the strictly state administered system there were 81,000 pensioners on the rolls as against an original maximum estimate of 70,000, he stated

what Irvin S. Cobb thinks about:

The Lord's Shock Troops

WESTWOOD, HILLS, CAL.—In peace: I knew streets in New York where citizens went at their own risk, and policemen walked in pairs. But some were as safe as though they'd been in church—a doctor with his kit; a nurse in her uniform; a priest or a nun; a preacher or a rabbi, and always a Salvation Army worker.



Irvin S. Cobb

In war: Ask any veteran what organization, no matter how big its personnel, or how fat its purse, outdid the Salvation Army in service to our soldiers, whatsoever the race or the creed or the color.

At Christmas: Who sent Santa down cold chimneys to gladden the hearts of children at hearthstones that elsewise would be desolate? Who brought a measure of holiday cheer to the misery-laden, putting clothes on the backs and dinners in the stomachs of the naked and the hungry?

So, for their eleventh-hour drive for their Christmas fund, thank God for the Salvation Army. Every cent went where it should have gone when you gave it to them, for verily I tell you, as one who knows, these are the shock troops of the Lord.

That Marvelous Hen

WHATEVER became of the hen which from time to time hauled off and laid an egg with mysterious initialing on it? In my days on a country newspaper this gifted fowl was a regular journalistic feature. Her output might be soft-shelled and shy a yolk, but always the cryptic writing was there.

Once she produced an egg bearing letters which many translated as prophesying "war." But somebody pointed but that if you read the message the other way it spelt "raw," which also seemed to cover the case.

This barnyard phenomenon died too soon. How the New Deal boys could use a hen capable of turning out weird alphabetical combinations and then going off and forgetting them!

Afterthought—Among all the office seekers or office holders who have been or may be mentioned for a Presidential nomination next year—or even for Vice President—you will search in vain for the name of Governer Hoffman of New Jersey.

Destroying a Skunk

I'VE just been reading—until I stopped to gag—the latest novel of one of the new school of authors; you know, those so-called realists who mistake filth for fiction and lewdness for literature. I wouldn't say this person was much of a writer, but he certainly is a practical dirt-farmer.

I've never believed in censorship for creative work; and as regards this group, I've always gone on the theory, paraphrasing an old line of an old ballad, that they were more to be pitied than censored.

But for the individual offender against common decency—well, when I was a younster down South, they told me the surest way to destroy a skunk was to pen him under a barrel and just let him smell himself to death on his own personal perfumes.

Our Younger Generation.

IN THE paper I see where, for their Sunday sermons, three ministers preached on modern youth—with particular references to the shortcomings of same.

I haven't a doubt that the first caveman, surveying the antics of his coltish brood, remarked in tones of gloomy resignation to his hairy mate:

"Well, mommer, the world's done pretty well while we ran it. Look at the hole in the roof to let the smoke out, that I thought up right out of my own head, be-gee! And now when I get the trick of this new throwing-stick worked out, civilization will just about have reached her peak. But heaven help the poor old earth when that bunch of crazy kids yonder takes hold!"

Before we start blaming the oncoming generation for everything, including its own sins, which are sufficiently manifest already, let's go back to where this buck-passing habit started. Let's go back to Adam, the derned old experimentalist!

Fish Wanted

There are fish in Lake Titicaca, the highest in the world, but not enough, says the Philadelphia Inquirer. They are of a coarse, native variety, and the larger number of natives who live on the lake's shores would like more refined fish, although the water is said to be too cold for most European varieties. The Bolivian and Peruvian governments have therefore signed a "formal diplomatic agreement" whose object is to create a fishing industry on this sheet of water set in the Andes 12,000 feet above sea level and 5,000 square miles in area, and re-stock it. It is confidently expected that foreign experts will find some species of fish that will be able to bear the intense cold, even though the natives, who from time immemorial have fished from frail boats made of reeds, refrain from learning to swim because they cannot stand the cold themselves.

Winter-Born People Found Lower in IQ Than Others

Are people born in the winter as intelligent as those born in the summer? No. At least, Prof. Rudolph Pintner and Dr. George Forlano, psychologists of Teachers college, Columbia, report in the Journal of Educational Psychology a study they made of the intelligence quotients—now known as the IQ's—of 17,502 children and young people, and they found those born in the winter had a slightly but consistently lower score on intelligence tests than those born during the other months.

The forces that impel action reside in temperatment. The ideals and convictions that guide it are hidden in the mind and heart. Don't Entrust Your Own or Your Family's Well-Being to Unknown Preparations

BEFORE you take any preparation you don't know all about, for the relief of headaches; or the pains of rheumatism, neuritis or neuralgia, ask your doctor what he thinks about it — in comparison with Genuine Bayer Aspirin.

We say this because, before the discovery of Bayer Aspirin, most so-called "pain" remedies were advised against by physicians as being bad for the stomach; or, often, for the heart. And the discovery of Bayer Aspirin largely changed medical practice.

Countless thousands of people who have taken Bayer Aspirin year in and out without ill effect, have proved that the medical findings about its safety were correct.

Remember this: Genuine Bayer Aspirin is rated among the fastest methods yet discovered for the relief of headaches and all common pains . . . and safe for the average person to take regularly.

You can get real Bayer Aspirin at any drug store — simply by never asking for it by the name "aspirin" alone, but always saying BAYER ASPIRIN when you buy.

SYNOPSIS

The future of the still youthful and comely "Widder" Marcia Howe, recently released by death from her idling, selfish husband, is a conversational tit-bit among housewives of the little hamlet of Wilton. Eligible bachelors and widowers also are interested. Marcia, despite her unfortunate matrimonial experience, finds pleasure in her life, but is lonely at times, and has invited her late husband's niece, Sylvia Hayden, whom she has never seen, to visit her. The girl arrives and Marcia takes to her at once, while Sylvia, expecting to see a somewhat elderly aunt, finds Marcia more like a sister. A stranger, on the verge of exhaustion, finds his way to Marcia's home.

As if their questions penetrated his consciousness, the stranger slowly opened his eyes.

"Sorry to come here like this," he murmured. "The fog was so thick, I lost my bearings and my power-boat ran aground. I've been trying hours to get her off. She's hard and fast on your sand-bar."

He struggled to rise and Marcia, kneeling beside him, helped him into an upright position where he sat, leaning against her shoulder.

"I seem to have brought in about half the sea with me," he apologized, looking about in vague, half-dazed fashion.

"No matter. We're used to salt water here," she answered. "How do you feel? You're not hurt?"

"Only a little. Nothing much. I've done something queer to my wrist. I was trying to push the boat off, and something suddenly gave way."

Turning his head aside, he bit his lip as if in pain.

"We'll telephone Doctor Stetson. Meanwhile, you mustn't remain in these wet clothes. There is no surer way of catching cold. Do you think you could get upstairs if Sylvia and I guided you?"

"I guess so—if it isn't far. I'm absurdly dizzy. I don't know why. I suppose, though, I must shed these wet togs."

"You certainly must. Come, Sylvia, lend a hand! We'll help him up."

"Oh, I'm not in such a bad way as all that. I can get up alone," he protested. "Only please wait just another minute. The whole place has suddenly begun to pitch again like a ship in midocean. Perhaps I may be faint. I haven't eaten anything for a day or two."

"Why didn't you tell me? The soup, quick, Sylvia. I only wish I had some brandy. Well, at least this is hot, and will warm you up. I'll feed you. Hand me the cup and spoon, Sylvia."

"No matter. We must get something hot inside you right away. Don't fuss about how it's done," said the practical-minded Marcia. "There! You look better already! Later you shall have a real, honest-to-goodness meal. Run and call Doctor Stetson, Sylvia, and open the bed in the room opposite mine. You might light the heater there, too."

"Suppose we try to make the rocking chair now. Shall we? But what worries me is your wet clothing. I'm afraid you'll take your death of cold. Let me peel off your shoes and socks. I can do that. And I believe I could get you out of your water-soaked sweater if I were to cut the sleeve. May I try? We needn't mind wrecking it, for I have another I can give you."

The man did not answer.

Instead, he sat tense and unsmiling, his penetrating brown eyes fixed on Marcia's face. Apparently the scrutiny crystallized in him some swift resolution, for after letting his glance travel about the room to convince himself that no one was within hearing, he leaned forward:

"There is something else I'd rather you did for me first," he whispered, dropping his voice until it became almost inaudible. "I've a package here I wish you'd take charge of. It's inside my shirt. But for this infernal wrist, I could reach it."

"I'll get it."

"I'd rather you didn't talk about it," continued he, hurriedly. "Just put it in a safe place. Will you, please?"

"Certainly."

Puzzled, but unquestioning, Marcia thrust her hand beneath his sodden clothing and drew forth a small, flat box, wrapped in a bedraggled handkerchief.

"Of course I will," smiled Marcia. "Look! Here is my pet hiding-place. This brick in the hearth is loose and under it is plenty of space for this small box. I'll tuck it in there. Just hold it a second until I pry the brick up. There we are! Now give it to me."

She reached hurriedly for the package, but as their hands met, the moist, clinging handkerchief became entangled in their fingers and slipping from its coverings a leather jewel-case dropped to the floor.

Marcia stifled an involuntary cry.

Nevertheless, she neither looked up nor delayed.

"Sorry to be so clumsy," she muttered, as she swiftly scooped up the jewels.

It was well she had made haste, for no sooner was the clasp on the box snapped and the treasure concealed beneath the floor than Sylvia returned, and a moment later came both Doctor Jared Stetson and Elisha Winslow.

"Mornin', Marcia," nodded the doctor. "'Lish happened to be in the office when your niece called up, an' hearin' you had a man patient, he thought mebbe he might be of use. What 'pears to be the trouble, sir?"

"I've done something to my right wrist."

"H—m—m!" With skilled hand, he pushed back the dripping sleeve.

"You're a mite water-logged, I notice," observed he. "Been overboard?"

"Something of the sort," returned the man, with the flicker of a smile.

"You don't say! Well, I ain't surprised. 'Tain't no day to be afloat. You couldn't cut this fog with a carvin'-knife. How come you to take your boat out in such weather?" the doctor demanded.

"I was—was cruising."

"Oh, an' the fog shut down on you. I see. Fog has a trick of doin' that, unless one keeps an eye for fog symptoms. Now, what I'd recommend for you first of all, Mr. Carlton, is a warm bed. You look clean beat out. Better let 'Lish an' me help you upstairs, an out of your wet things, 'cause with a wrist such as yours, I figger you won't be very handy at buttons. Not that 'Lish is a professional lady's maid. That ain't exactly his callin'. Still, in spite of bein' town sheriff, he can turn his hand to other things. It's lucky he can, too, for he don't get much sheriffin' down this way. Wilton doesn't go in for crime. In fact, we was laughin' 'bout that very thing this noon at the post office. 'Pears there's been a robbery at one of the Long Island estates. Quantities of jewelry taken, an' no trace of the thief. The alarm was sent out over the radio early yesterday an' listenin' in 'Lish, here, got quite het up an' not a little envious. He said he 'most wished the burglary had took place in our town, excitement bein' at a pretty low ebb now."

Marcia, standing by the stove, spun about.

"Now, Elisha, don't you run down Wilton. Why, I have twenty-five dollars in my purse this minute," she asserted, taking a worn pocket-book from her dress and slapping it with challenging candor down upon the table. "I keep it in that china box above the stove."

"That might serve as a starter," remarked the stranger, regarding her quizzically.

She faced him, chin drawn in, and head high and defiant.

"Besides that, in my top bureau drawer is a string of gold beads that belonged to my great-grandmother," she continued, daring laughter curling her lips. "They are very old and are really quite valuable."

"We'll make a note of those, too," nodded the man, his eyes on hers.

"I'm afraid that's all I can offer in the way of burglary inducements."

"That bein' the case, s'pose you an' me start gettin' the patient upstairs, 'Lish," broke in Doctor Stetson. "If we don't, next we know he'll be havin' pneumonia as well as a bad wrist."

The stranger's admiring glance fixed itself on Marcia's.

"What is my next move?" he inquired.

"I told you before—you must take off your wet things and rest," she repeated.

"You still prescribe that treatment?"

"I still prescribe it."

"In spite of the—the symptoms?"

"Why not?" was her quick answer.

"Very well. I am ready, gentlemen." Erect, even with a hint of defiance in his mocking smile, the man rose to his full height. "Before we go, however, I must correct a slight error. You misunderstood my name. It is not Carlton. It is Heath—Stanley Heath."

CHAPTER IV

"And yet you told me, Marcia, this was a quiet, adventureless place!" burst out Sylvia, the instant the door had closed.

"It doesn't seem so to me. When shipwrecked mariners fall into your arms entirely without warning, I call it thrilling. Who do you suppose he is?"

"He told us his name."

"Of course—Heath. Stanley Heath. It's quite a romantic name, too. But I didn't mean that. I mean where did he come from and why? Didn't he tell you?"

"Not a word."

Obviously the girl was disappointed.

"I thought perhaps he might have while I was upstairs. I was gone long enough for him to pour out to you his entire history. At least it seemed so to me. I ransacked every closet and drawer in sight trying to find something for him to put on. It wasn't until I struck that old sea-chest in the hall that I discovered pajamas and underwear. I hope you don't mind my taking them."

A shiver passed over Marcia.

"No. They were Jason's. I ought to have told you they were there. I kept them because I thought they might sometime be useful."

"Well, they certainly are," replied Sylvia. "They will exactly fit Mr. Heath. Where do you suppose he came from? And how long has he been knocking about in that boat, I wonder."

"How do I know, dear?" Marcia sighed, as if determined to control her patience. "You know as much about him as I do. I mean," she corrected, honesty forcing her to amend the assertion, "almost as much. I did, to be sure, talk with him a little while waiting for the doctor, but he did not tell me anything about himself."

The moving of chairs overhead and the sound of feet creaking down the stairway heralded the return of Jared Stetson and Elisha.

Marcia went to meet them.

"'Tain't a broken wrist, Marcia," was the doctor's greeting on entering the kitchen. "Leastways, I don't think it is. I've bandaged it an' Lish an' me have your friend snug an' warm in bed. Tomorrow I'll look in again: For tonight, the bandage will do. A hot water-bottle mightn't be amiss. Nor a square meal, neither. Beyond them two things, there ain't much you can do at present, but let him sleep. Seems a nice sort of feller. Known him long?"

"Not so very long."

"Why, Marcia—" broke in Sylvia.

"One sometimes comes to know a person rather well, though, even in a short time," went on the older woman, ignoring the interruption.

"S'pose 'twas a-comin' to see you that brought him down this way," Elisha volunteered. "Somehow I don't recall meetin' him before."

"He hasn't been here before," was the measured response.

"Oh, so he's new to Wilton waters, eh? That prob'ly accounts for his runnin' aground. Fine lookin' chap. Has quite an air to him. Nothin' cheap 'bout his clothes neither. They was A1 quality clear through to his skin. Silk, with monograms on 'em. Must be a man of means."

Silence greeted the observation.

"I really couldn't say."

Elisha's interest in the stranger was not, however, to be so easily diverted.

"Seen the boat?" he inquired.

"No."

"Oh, you ain't! I forgot to ask Heath the name of her. I'm sort of a crank on the names of boats. It always riles me to have a foolish name given a boat. No matter how small she is, her plankin' is all that divides her owner from fathoms of water, an' in view of the fact he'd oughter regard her soberly an' give her a decent name."

"Well, I hope the name of Mr. Heath's boat will meet with your approval," ventured Sylvia archly.

"I hope 'twill," was the glum retort, as the sheriff followed Doctor Stetson through the doorway.

"Forgive my butting in, dear," apologized she. "But I was so surprised. You did say you didn't know Mr. Heath, didn't you?"

"Yes."

"But—but—"

"Sometimes it's just as well not to tell all you know—especially in a place like this," was the evasive response.

Was the reply a rebuke or merely a caution?

Sylvia did not know.

And what was the meaning of the rose color that flooded the elder woman's cheek?

Had Marcia really meant to give the impression that she knew Stanley Heath? And if so, why?

She would have been interested indeed had she known that while she wrestled with the enigma, Marcia, to all appearances busy preparing the tray for the invalid upstairs, was searching her heart for answers to the same questions.

Why had she sought to shield this stranger?

The man was nothing to her. Of his past she had not the slightest knowledge, indeed he might be the greatest villain in the world. In fact, circumstances proclaimed him a thief. Nevertheless, she did not, could not, believe it. There was something too fine in his face; his eyes.

True, he had made no attempt either to defend himself or to explain away the suspicions he must have known would arise in her mind. On the contrary, with a devil-may-care audacity that fascinated her, he actually appeared to have tried to deepen in her mind the impression of his guilt.

Still she refused to believe. Even in the face of overwhelming evidence she clung to her unreasoning faith in him.

Suppose he had stolen the gems and fled with them from Long Island? Suppose he had lost his bearings in the fog; tossed aimlessly on the sea for a day and a night; and then run aground at her doorstep? It was possible, quite possible, even probable.

Yet was it?

Not for a man like Stanley Heath, Marcia stubbornly insisted. So deep was the conviction, she shrank lest he should feel called upon to justify or defend himself.

An Ancient Roman Gate Still in Use in England

The only Roman town gate still in use in England is the Newport Arch in London, which archeologists believe was built between 50 B. C. and 50 A. D.

Besides the main arch is a smaller one, formerly used as a "needle's eye" to admit people after the main gate closed at dusk.

Forest Fire Loss Is Low in 1935

Forest fires during 1935 were less destructive than in any year since 1927, final reports received by Grover M. Conzet, director of the division of Forestry, revealed.

There were 766 fires, burning over 25,384 acres, with a loss estimated at approximately $35,000. No lives were lost.

Total timber loss was estimated at $10,000 but only a small fraction of this consisted of merchantable timber, according to A. E. Pimley, forester in charge of fire prevention.

Fires in peat and swamp lands accounted for more than 10,009 acres of the total area burned, Mr. Pimley said.

Fires were most numerous in Lake of the Woods, Roseau, Beltrami, Clearwater, Crow Wing, Aitkin and St. Louis counties.

The cost of suppressing the fires was approximately $11,000. A total of 6,365 men were active in fighting the fires; 2,311 men were employed for this purpose, while 4,054 were volunteers. The value of the volunteer labor alone was nearly $8,000, according to Mr. Pimley.

"Abundant rainfall was primarily responsible for the low fire hazard during 1935", Mr. Pimley said, "but greater experience of our personnel and a more efficient tower and communications system were very important factors in lowering fire losses."

Muskrat Season in March

Members of the Conservation Commission last week approved an open season for muskrats for a twelve day period between March 1 and April 30. The exact dates will be announced later by A. C. Hanson, director of the division of game and fish.

The season will be limited to the counties in the eastern half of the state, a recent survey having indicated that muskrats are relatively scarce in the drouth-stricken western counties but plentiful in eastern sections of the state.

CHILDREN and LIQUOR

The devil himself could do no more than to invent a concoction of mixing alcohol in candy and selling it to children so as to develop an appetitie for the brewers' liquid fire. Yet this is one of the latest fads of the liquor traffic in order to make young America "liquor conscious."

Not long ago forty gallons of synthetic alcohol were discovered in the living quarters of a woman who owned a store near a Chicago school. She was arrested and charged with selling colored alcohol to school children. A few parents had complained that their children had come home from school partly intoxicated.

Cold weather will bring cold motors often making cranking of cars necessary. Cranking the wrong way often results in broken arms, broken wrists and smashed fingers. The following precautions should be taken in cranking an automobile:

Crank Motors carefully. Pull up with short pulls. Keep thumb off handle. See that the spark is retarded. Be sure the motor is not in gear.

Tax Rates For Many Units In County Down

While state and county governments were forced to increase tax rates in order to obtain necessary revenues with which to operate, 115 school districts, 27 townships and three villages in Marshall county were able to offer taxpayers a reduction in rates for 1936 taxation purposes.

This information was gleaned from comparison of tax rates for 1934 and 1935, the new tax rate sheet being announced by P. E. Kvikstad, county treasurer, the rates having been established in the office of Levi G. Johnson, county auditor.

Combined tax rates for county state, school and village purposes in Stephen, Argyle, Holt, Middle River and Warren show a reduction over the 1934 rate, while the combination rates for Alvarado, Newfolden, Strandquist, Oslo, Viking and Grygla show increases, comparison of the rates reveals.

Owners of real estate used for agricultural purposes located in independent school districts will have a lower rate than the owners of village or city property, as a result of new laws passed at the 1935 session of the legislature. The new law prohibits a rate of more than 10 percent more than average rate for maintenance of rural schools of the county plus an additional levy to make up deficiencies in state aids, debt service and capital outlay, said H. M. Hanson, deputy county auditor. The average rate for maintenance of rural schools in the county was set at 12.4 mills and with the 10 per cent addition makes an average of 13.64 mills.

Tax rates will show increases for the coming yeaa in 33 school districts, 21 townships and five villages while nine school districts, one township and three villages will have identical rates. Four school districts will have no levy whatsoever.

The village of Holt will again be confronted with the highest tax rate of any village in the county with a combined rate of 227.94 mills which is a decrease of 33.18 mills from last year which totaled 261.12 mill. The new rate includes 13.57 mills for the state, 31.57 mills for the county, 126 mills for the school district No. 35 and 56.5 mills for the village.

Townships in the county which decreased their rates include Alma, Agdar, Augsburg, Big Woods, Boxville, Como, Eagle Point, East Park, East Valley, Esplee, Excel, Grand Plain, Holt, Lincoln, Marsh Grove, Moylan, Mud Lake, Nelson Park, New Main, Oak Park, Valley, Veldt, Warrenton, West Valley and Whiteford. Comstock township with 7.7 mills maintained the same rate for the two years.

Villages in the county decreasing their rate include Argyle, Grygla and Holt. Oslo, Stephen and Warren kept the same rates for both years.

Treasury Head Reports Repeal Results O. K.

By W. G. Calderwood

According to radio report on the second anniversary of repeal the Secretary of the U. S. Treasury considers the results of the present repeal policy satisfactory.

While the Census Bureau figures show that deaths from alcoholism declined 37.5 percent during the four years preceding the legislation of beer, there was a "satisfactory" increase of 16 percent as shown by the latest figures.

The New York Times states that the Federal alcohol unit made the "satisfactory" report that during the fiscal year 1935 its agents seized and destroyed 16,988 illegal stills which rivals the heyday of prohibition.

The same newspaper reports a "satisfactory" increase of 83 pct. in convictions for drunken driving in New York State during the first 10 months of 1935 as compared with pre-repeal 1933.

Private reports corroborate the "satisfactory" official figures.

The Samaritan Treatment for Alcoholism of Los Angeles makes the "satisfactory" report that it is treating 300 percent more alcoholics than prior to repeal. And the Keeley Liquor Cure Institute of Dwight, Illinois reports a "satisfactory" increase in the number of women inmates in that institution.

The report of the National Safety Council indicated a "satisfactory" showing that 'had-been-drinking' drivers in fatal accidents increased 29 percent and pedestrians 53 percent after repeal.

Dr. Alice Aldrich, Chicago Welfare superintendent, makes a report of the "satisfactory" conditions in that city under repeal: "Chicago present-day saloons are causing delinquency among young girls to an extent never equalled in the old days. Young people of opposite sexes drink openly until they are no longer responsible for their acts. * * The saloons with their back-room and upstairs facilities constitute an alarming cause of immorality."

A report comes from A. L. Hooper, city prosecutor, showing the "satisfactory" conditions in that city: "Booze! Booze! Everywhere you look you find booze! Juveniles and anyone else can get beer in almost every little store!" And similar reports of "satisfactory" conditions pour in from all quarters.

However satisfactory these conditions may be to the officials that are charged with the administration of the law, they are appalling to all who are not blinded by political expediency.

Traffic Fatalities Climb to New Height

The National Safety Council announces that motor vehicle deaths in the United States reached a new high in 1935. This is in spite of the Council's vigorous 5-year campaign to reduce traffic deaths 35 per cent by 1940. Traffic officers and the news and magazine press joined the drive with enthusiasm. That this aggressive team work failed to halt the upswing of traffic fatalities is viewed by the Council as a discouraging sign.

Dr. Robbins Stoeckel of Yale University, widely known as a traffic expert, put his finger on one of the perplexing problems of highway safety when he said:

"The really dangerous driver is the man who has had one or two drinks only, who still thinks that he is in possession of his faculties, but whose driving judgment has been impaired. On the highways moderate drinking is more dangerous than immoderate."

The late Dr. Emil Kraepelin, the world-famous German physiologist, stated the same fact as the result of very exhaustive experimentation. He said:

"The powers of perception and judgment are from the beginning distinctly affected, tho he who drinks is quite unconscious of this effect. The actual facts are exactly opposite to the popular belief."

A weak point in the safety drive is the ignorance of drinking drivers on this vital point. The fact is that the physiological reaction that follows the drinking of a small amount of alcohol is a feeling of overconfidence. The drinker thinks he can see better, that his judgment is more acute, and that he can act more quickly and surely. But the actual results, as proven by careful and varied experiments, is exactly the opposite.

The National Safety Council has strongly stressed the danger of the has-been-drinking driver who "cold sober," but whose perceptions and reactions are seriously impaired by the couple of cocktails or bottle of beer.

A knowledge of these results is probably responsible for the fact that one of the big distilleries spent $100,000 in advertising space recently to blazen over the nation the maxim—"If you are going to drive, don't drink; if you are going to drink, don't drive."

Winter Show Premium List Being Sent Out

An attractive Winter Shows premium list dressed in the Winter Shows colors, green and yellow, has just been forwarded to prospective exhibitors by John Saugstad, Business Manager. In addition to general information, rules and regulations, the 56 page publication contains photographs of the Red River Valley Livestock association buildings in which the Winter Shows exhibits will be housed, group photographs of the Board of Managers and sponsoring organizations, together with department officials.

Mr. Saugstad states that all industrial space has been engaged, while department superintendents anticipate increased entries in all departments. O. M. Kizer reports more entries in the livestock department on January 10 than ever before so far in advance of the show. It has been necessary to limit entries in the livestock sale which will be held during the week as a total of 50 head had been consigned by the first of the year. Greater interest is likewise evident in the crops and poultry departments according to supervisors R. S. Dunham, T. M. McCall, and Harold Thomforde.

Christmas Tree Waste Reduced

The usual waste of Christmas trees through indiscriminate cutting was nearly eliminated as the result of the Christmas tree law passed by the 1935 Legislature, according to a statement issued by Grover M. Conzet, director of forestry.

Preliminary estimates indicate that approximately 1,800,000 Christmas trees were cut in Minnesota in 1935.

Of this number approximately 1,200,000 were exported to other states and 600,000 were used in Minnesota; 450,000 trees were subject to the tax imposed by the Christmas tree law, while 150,000 trees, used by municipalities, were tax exempt.

The Christmas tree law, passed by the 1935 Legislature, required all trees cut or sold in Minnesota to bear official evergreen tree tags.

There were practically no major violations of the law and operators are said to be very much in favor of continuing it. Passage of the law made it possible for the first time to gather accurate figures on the Christmas tree industry in Minnesota.

H. S. Art Students Vie In Poster Competition

Hundreds of art students in Minnesota high schools are participating in the safety poster contest being conducted by the Minnesota Public Safety committee, according to information received by C. H. Zealand, director of the committee.

The students not only may win prizes in the contest, but also are given the opportunity of having their work displayed in thousands of locations in the state.

The winning posters will be used by the committee in its 1936 campaign to reduce traffic fatalities in Minnesota. Last year, the committee displayed the posters in 10,000 locations.

The posters submitted for consideration must be in the mails not later than midnight Saturday, Feb. 29, and should be sent parcel post to the Minnesota Public Safety committee in the State Capitol.

"The posters should visualize the accident hazards surrounding pedestrians and motorists," Zealand said. "Each poster should serve as a dramatic safety warning and it should carry a powerful appeal for more careful driving and more cautious walking."

Prizes for the best posters include two $175 courses at a Minneapolis art school, a one term (fifteen-weeks) course at another Minneapolis art school and a one-term (three-months) term at a St. Paul art school.

In addition, standard drawing outfits are offered for the five next outstanding entries and instructors of prize-winning students will receive leather letter cases.

Each student is asked to submit two posters. The posters must be 15 inches wide and 13 inches long, finished on bristol or reproduction board and be drawn with India ink to permit plate reproduction. They should carry a concise safety message, with action predominant.

Citizens Invited to Attend "U" Lectures

Minneapolis, January—To attend without charge one of the most important annual series of lectures presented on the University of Minnesota campus is the invitation being broadcast to all Minnesotans to be in Minneapolis on any of the next four Fridays, namely, January 24 and 31 and February 7 and 14.

This is the Sigma Xi series of scientific lectures, which have been given each winter for a number of years in Northrop Memorial Auditorium on four Friday evenings when the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra is on tour. The lectures begin at 8:15 and are preceeded by a brief concert.

"Medical Science and Human Welfare" is the general subject of the 1936 series, in which the four lectures will be the following:

January 31: Dr. Owen H. Wangensteen, head of the department of surgery in the University of Minnesota Medical School, "Benefactions of surgery to man."

February 14: Dr. Irvine McQuarrie, head of the department of pediatrics, "Endocrine glands in health and in disease."

Sigma Xi is an honor society in the fields of science. Announcing the lecture series, its president, Dr. Charles A. Mann, head of the division of chemical engineering, says: "This is an opportunity to hear interesting, authoritative and non-technical papers by outstanding scientific scholars. Moving pictures, slides, scientific exhibits and charts will be employed in the presentations."

Benson, Amlie Enter Bill for Youth Aid

A bill to establish a permanent program to provide opportunities for employment and education for young people between sixteen and twenty-five was introduced in Congress, Tuesday, January 12, 1936, by Representative Thomas Amlie, (Prog., Wis.) and Senator Elmer Benson, Farmer-Laborite recently appointed by Governor Floyd Olson of Minnesota to fill the vacancy left by the death of Thomas S. Schall.

The American Youth Act was drawn up at last summer's sessions of the American Youth Congress, representing 850 youth organizations. It has received widespread support from many bodies; including the new American Student Union, the National Student Federation of America, the National Council of Methodist Youth, the Rhode Island State Federation of Labor, many local trade unions, Y. W. C. A.'s and Y. M. C. A.'s.

Anticipating the end of the National Youth Administration which automatically goes out of existence on June 31, the bill provides a permanent government set-up to give aid through work projects for unemployed youth, and through college projects to needy undergraduate and graduate students, and a complete free public education in high schools and vocational schools.

The Secretary of Labor and the U. S. Commissioner of Education are authorized to provide a system of vocational training and project employment for those out of work at prevailing wage rates in any event to be not less than $15 per week plus $3 for each dependent. Administration is vested in Youth Commissions, on which youth organizations, labor and educational experts shall be equally represented.

Payment of fees and average weekly living expenses for high school and vocational school students is also provided. In colleges and universities, projects are to be academic in scope, "in accordance with educational purposes of the institutions", and will provide not less than $25 monthly for needy students.

Over 1,500,000 American youth people are represented by the Youth Congress which drafted the act. Many thousand more have shown their belief in the necessity for the measure through their organizations.

"The time has come", Senator Benson said, "when we ought to establish as a fundamental the proposition that young people have an absolute right to useful employment and educational opportunities."

"One of the major tragedies of the depression has been the denial of opportunity to the youth of the country," Representative Amlie said. "If the government has any responsibility at all to provide for the general welfare of the people it has the responsibility to provide opportunities for useful labor, for education, for nomal living to the ten million young people who have been victimized by the depression."

Educators and labor leaders have endorsed the measure heartily. Francis Gorman, United Textile Workers official, has given it his support, as have George S. Counts and Goodwin B. Watson of Columbia University, and Julius Hochman and Charles Zimmerman of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union.

Minn. Among Leading in Road Building in U. S.

The annual report of the U. S. Bureau of Public Roads for 1935 shows Minnesota among the top ranking states in several divisions of accomplishment, according to a highway department announcement.

In work accomplished with National Recovery act funds in the period covered by the report, Minnesota is ranked as follows:

Completed mileage of improvements on the federal aid highway system outside of municipalities, third place among all the states; completed mileage on extensions of the federal aid system into and through municipalities, second among all the states.

With Hayden-Cartwright act federal funds, Minnesota also ranked in third place in completed mileage on the federal aid system outside of municipalities, in second place in completed mileage of extensions of the federal aid system into and through municipalities, and in fourth place in completed mileage of secondary or feeder roads.

Hitler Orders New Line-up of U.S.A. Nazis

Berlin (CS)—Concern over the activities of the "Friends of the New Germany" in the United States has led the German Government to issue stringent orders regarding the composition of this organization. The Friends of the New Germany while an outspoken Nazi organization, has always claimed to be politically independent of Nazi Germany and to represent solely the political views of Americans of German descent.

The new orders issued at the instruction of Hitler instructs all German nationals in the United States to give up their political activities and membership in this and similar organizations. Circles close to the Friends of the New Germany claim that the membership of German nationals amounts to about one-third of the total membership. In reality the organization is mainly made up of German citizens and its leaders are Germans who have recently acquired American citizenship. The total membership is estimated at about eight to ten thousand.

The action taken by Hitler must be considered as camouflage and for the sole purpose of quieting the storm of protest over Nazi activities in the United States.

NOVEMBER FARM RECEIPTS HIGHER

All farm regions shared in the "considerably larger" cash receipts from sales of principal farm products in November compared with November 1934, reports the Bureau of Agricultural Economics. Receipts by States averaged 26 percent more than in November 1934.

Twin City Market Week Will Offer Selling Aids

Aids to merchandise selling thru retail advertising and show card window displays will be one of the main topics to be discussed at clinics to be conducted during Twin City Market Week, Feb. 3 to 8 when thousands of merchants from all parts of the northwest gather in Minneapolis and St. Paul for the semi-annual buying event.

The clinics will be addressed by leading advertising and display men of the Twin Cities, according to arrangements made by A. C. Gasser of the Minneapolis Civic & Commerce association and M. B. Lathrop of the St. Paul Association of Commerce.

C. S. Arnquist of New Richmond, Wis., president of the National Merchants association, and William Coulter of St. Paul, executive secretary, have arranged for the appearance of Dr. Glenn Frank as chief speaker at the association's annual banquet held in conjunction with market week for all visiting merchants.

Dr. Frank is president of the University of Wisconsin and one of the recognized authorities in the field of education, merchandising and general problems of the retailer.

Another nationally known speaker will be Congressman Wright Patman of Texas, who will address merchants attending the convention of the Northwest Shoe Retailers association at the Radisson hotel.

In inviting merchants to attend market week, Mr. Arnquist pointed out that "1936 is the year to take advantage of the renewed buying power in the northwest, the time to go to market and find out what is new and be prepared to get a share of the profits which will come to the retailer this spring and summer."

"The merchant who stays at home and then grumbles about business has no one but himself to blame. Come to market, meet your fellow merchants. Discuss your problems with him. See what the business houses are offering in new merchandise. Learn the new trends in styles. Know what to expect this spring and summer and when business comes, be on the receiving end of it rather than bemoan the fact that business is not what it should be", Mr. Arnquist concluded.

Highway Department Marks 30th Birthday

This month marks the thirtieth anniversary of the beginning of the Minnesota state highway department. In January, 1906, Governor John A. Johnson named George W. Cooley as state engineer, serving under direction of a non-salaried highway commission.

Gradually this division of state activity was developed and expanded until the state trunk highway system came into existence in 1921.

Head Hunting Becoming Thing of the Past in the Philippines

Still Persists in the Remote Areas, but Loses Its Appeal Elsewhere.

The biggest and busiest native market in all the Philippines is situated in Baguio. Sunday marks the high point of any week's trading. All day Friday and Saturday the mountain trails for miles around are dotted with natives coming to market, bringing their products for sale and having in mind the purchase of things they need.

Baguio is the most beautiful and most healthful resort in the Far East, with wild mountain scenery, and cool forests of stately pines spreading out in every direction. It is the "summer capital" of the Philippines; Americans predominate the population.

Sunday crowds at the market are estimated to number from four thousand to seven thousand. Some come in carts drawn by carabos or bullocks; some by bus; a few in automobiles so old and broken that one wonders if they will hold together for the return trip; others on freight trucks, but the majority walks.

Let the Women Do the Work.

The women are the burden carriers and they bring to market the products of garden, field, and jungle in large baskets carried on their backs and supported by a wide leather head strap resting across their foreheads. Another type of basket is carried on top of the head.

In addition to the foodstuffs displayed in the market there are many examples of native handcraft—home woven fabrics, coarser, and not beautifully embroidered as is the pina cloth of the South; silver jewelry, wood carvings, including book ends for the tourist trade, curios, brass and metal work, and rattan and wicker baskets of many sizes, shapes, and styles.

The Dog Market.

A short distance into a ravine leading to the market is the stockyards of the Philippines, where pigs and hogs to the number of a hundred are tethered to stakes while awaiting buyers. Beyond the pig market is the spot where horse trading takes place. And beyond this, until recently when the white residents of Baguio protested against its continuance, was found the dog market.

Roast dog is a prized delicacy among Igorrotes. The protest was not based upon ar fastidious objection to dog eating, but the Igorrotes stuffed the poor animals with rice while alive and then beat them to death with clubs, thus assuring tender meat. So the dog market was moved. It is now in the hills back of the principal hotel, and at dawn the howls of the tortured and suffering canines render the morning hideous.

Good roads have accomplished much toward abolishing the former popular pastime of head hunting. In the old days villages of different tribes, though only a few miles distant from each other, regarded each other as enemies. It was the old story of "hating the stranger." Good roads brought them together, they got acquainted, and became less hostile, if not friendly.

Head Hunting Not Popular.

Head hunting still persists in the remote areas of Luzon, but is almost obsolete in the mountain province. The custom originated in the desire of the surviving members of a family to provide companions for a dead chief's spirit on the mysterious journey from earth to the Igorrote heaven. The quickest way to provide good company for the departing one was to remove the heads of a few members of an adjoining tribe. This done, reprisals were in order. Thus head hunting became an honored institution.

The taking of a head or heads was the occasion of a great feast in celebration of the event, and all the men, women, and children participating in the feast were entitled to the decoration of tattooing as a distinguishing mark. It is worthy of note that three in every five adult natives at the Baguio market bear the tattooed designs on the arms, indicating participation in a head hunting feast.

SYNOPSIS

The future of the still youthful and comely "Widder" Marcia Howe, recently released by death from her idling, selfish husband, is a conversational tit-bit among housewives of the little hamlet of Wilton. Eligible bachelors and widowers also are interested. Marcia, despite her unfortunate matrimonial experience, finds pleasure in her life, but is lonely at times, and has invited her late husband's niece, Sylvia Hayden, whom she has never seen, to visit her. The girl arrives and Marcia takes to her at once, while Sylvia, expecting to see a somewhat elderly aunt, finds Marcia more like a sister. A stranger, on the verge of exhaustion, finds his way to Marcia's home. He explains that his power-boat ran aground in the fog. Secretly, he asks Marcia to hide a package containing jewelry. She does so. Elisha Winslow, town sheriff, brings news of a jewel robbery on a neighboring estate. The stranger gives his name as Stanley Heath.

Far from demanding explanations, she resolved she would give him no chance to make them.

Therefore, when his meal was ready and every last inviting touch had been given the tray, she said casually to Sylvia:

"Suppose you take it up, dear?"

"I?"

"Yes. Why not? Do you mind?"

"Not at all. I just thought perhaps you'd rather."

Marcia shook her head.

"I want to stir the Newburg and see it doesn't catch," she explained, avoiding the girl's eyes. "We are too hungry to risk having our dinner spoiled. You might just wait and cut the chops for Mr. Heath and fix his potato. Find out, too, if there is anything more he wants. You needn't hurry back. I'll keep things hot."

The task suggested did not, apparently, displease Sylvia.

"Here goes Red Ridinghood," she murmured, taking up the tray. "All is, if I don't come back, you'll know the wolf has eaten me."

In spite of herself, Marcia smiled.

She opened the dor and stood watching while the girl ascended the stairs, for the hall was unlighted and the tray heavy.

"I'm safe," called a merry voice from the topmost stair.

Marcia came back into the kitchen. She finished preparing the lobster, straightened the silver on the table, and let in Prince Hal.

Ten minutes passed!

Fifteen!

Half an hour went by.

She fidgeted and stooped to pat the setter. Then she went to the window. Slowly the fog was lifting. By afternoon the weather would be fine—just the right sort to get the boat off. She would go up the beach and watch the men while they worked. The house was close. She longed for air and the big reaches of the out-of-doors.

A jingle of glass and silver! It was Sylvia returning with the tray. Her eyes were shining.

"He ate every bit!" she cried. "You should have seen him, Marcia. It would have done your heart good. The poor lamb was almost starved. He asked for you the first thing. I don't think he altogether liked your not carrying up the tray, although of course, he was too polite to say so."

"You explained I was busy?"

"Yes. But at first he didn't seem satisfied with the excuse. However, he soon forgot about it and became gay as a lark. Didn't you hear us laughing? The potato would fall off the fork. I'm not as good a nurse as you. My hands weren't so steady. I'm going back again for his wet clothes. We can dry them here by the fire, can't we?"

"Yes, indeed."

"It's a pity there isn't a tailor at hand. His suit ought to be pressed."

"I can do it," Marcia declared with eagerness. "I'm quite used to pressing men's clothes. I always pressed Jason's."

This time the name dropped unnoticed from her lips. Indeed she was not conscious she had uttered it. She was not thinking of Jason.

* * * * * * * *

Sylvia was glad Heath was asleep—very glad indeed. She did not begrudge him a moment of his slumber. But what a delightful person he was when awake! His eyes were wonderful—so dark and penetrating. They bored right through you. And then he listened with such intentness, watching every curve of your lips as if fearing to lose a word. Such attention was distinctly flattering. Even though your chatter was trivial, he dignified it and transformed it into something of importance.

How interested, for example, he had been in Marcia; in learning she had been married and now lived a widow in the old Daniels Homestead! And what a host of inquiries he had made about Jason—the sort of man he was and how long ago he had died!

Sylvia had not been able to answer all his questions, but of course she had asserted that Marcia had adored her husband because—well, not so much because she actually knew it, as because widows always did. Certainly Marcia had declared she loved the Homestead so deeply she never intended to leave it, and was not that practically the same thing as saying she loved Jason, too?

Anyway, the thing that really mattered was Mr. Heath's interest in her—Sylvia; in her trip east and her description of Alton City, the little midwestern town which was her home. How he had laughed at her rebellion at being a school teacher, and how insidiously he had hinted she might not always be one!

Oh, he knew what to say—knew much better than Billie Sparks, the soda fountain clerk, or even Horatio Fuller, the acknowledged beau of the town. In fact he made both of them seem quite commonplace—even Hortie. Fancy it!

Probably that was because he had traveled.

Apparently he had been almost everywhere—except to Alton City. Odd he should never have been there when he had visited just about every other corner, both of America and Europe. Not that he had deliberately said so. He was far too modest for that.

It was while trying to find out where his home was that she had stumbled upon the information.

And come to think of it, she did not know now where he lived, she suddenly remembered. She actually did not know whether he had a father or a mother; a brother or a sister.

So occupied was she with her thoughts she had not thought once of Prince Hal. In fact she had supposed that he had gone up the beach with Marcia.

Now she suddenly became aware that he stood sniffing about the hearth, scratching at its surface as if he scented something beneath.

He must not do that, and she told him so in no uncertain terms. Nevertheless, in spite of the rebuke, he continued to poke away at the spot, whining faintly, until his persistence aroused her curiosity and she went to see what disturbed him.

"What is it, Prince? What's the matter?" whispered she.

Delighted to have gained her attention, the dog barked.

"Oh, you mustn't bark, darling," she cautioned, muzzling his nose with her hand. "You'll wake Mr. Heath. Tell Missy what the trouble is. Do you smell a mousie under there?"

For answer the dog wagged his tail.

"I don't believe it," Sylvia demurred. "You're only bluffing. Well, to convince you, I'll take up the brick."

Fetching from the pantry a steel fork, she inserted the prongs in the crack and pried the offending brick out of its hole.

Sylvia chased after him.

"Bring it here, Hal! That's a good dog! Bring it to Missy."

As it fell to the ground, out rolled such a glory of jewels the girl could scarcely believe her eyes.

There was a string of diamonds, dazzling as giant dewdrops; a pearl and sapphire pendant; several beautiful rings; and an oval brooch, its emerald center surrounded by tier after tier of brilliants.

Sylvia panted, breathless. She had never seen such gems, much less held them in her hands. How she longed to slip the rings upon her fingers and try the effect of the diamonds about her slender throat!

Prudence, however, overmastered the impulse. Marcia might return and surprise her at any moment. Before that the treasure must be returned to the place from which it had been taken.

Gathering the rainbow heap together, she reluctantly thrust it into its blue leather case, snapped the catch, and placed it once more under the brick.

Then with relief she stood up and wiped the perspiration from her forehead.

It was not until she was again in her chair, book in hand, and struggling to quiet her quick breathing that she discovered she still held in her hand the handkerchief that had been wrapped about the jewel case.

It was a man's handkerchief of finest linen and one corner bore the embroidered initials S. C. H.

She had known it all the time! There was no need to be told the jewels were his. What puzzled her was when he had found time to hide them. He had not, so far as she knew, been left alone a moment and yet here was his booty safe beneath the floor.

She rated it as booty, because there could be no doubt he had stolen it. He had stolen it from that Long Island estate, escaped in his speed boat and here he was—here, under this very roof!

A robber—that was what he was!

That explained why he was so well-dressed, so handsome, had such fascinating manners. He was a gentleman burglar.

All up-to-date villains in these days were gentlemen. Not that she had ever encountered a villain in the flesh. Still, she had read romances about them and was there not one in every moving-picture? They were not difficult to recognize.

It was exhilarating—wonderful! A thief in the room overhead! Think of it! The very thief for whom all the police in the countryside were searching! He was no small, cheap type of criminal. He did things on a big scale—so big that radio announcements had been broadcast about him and no doubt at this instant detectives and crime inspectors were chasing up and down the highways; dashing through cities; and keeping telephone wires hot in wild search for the gentleman asleep upstairs!

Why, that very morning had not Elisha Winslow, the Wilton sheriff, who had frankly admitted he yearned for excitement, helped undress the wretch and put him comfortably to bed? The humor of the situation almost overcame her.

It seemed as if she must have someone to share the joke. But no one should. No! Nobody should be the wiser because of her. The poor, hunted fellow should have his chance.

It was a little venturesome and risky, she admitted, to obstruct justice and should she be found out she would, without doubt, be clapped into jail. Still she resolved to take a chance.

After all, who could prove she had known Stanley Heath to be what he was? Nobody. She would not even let him suspect it.

The important thing was to await an opportunity and soon—before he was able to be about—return the handkerchief she held in her hand to its place beneath the brick. Then all would be well. This should not be difficult. It would be quite easy to get Marcia to take up Mr. Heath's supper.

In the meantime, the situation was intensely amusing. Its danger appealed to her. She had always enjoyed hair-breadth escapades. Anything but dullness. That had been the trouble with Alton City—it had been dull—deadly dull.

But Wilton was not dull. In spite of the fact that only this morning Elisha Winslow had complained the town was in need of a stirring up, it seethed with electricity. If she chose, she could hurl a bomb-shell into its midst this very minute. But she did not choose.

Instead she intended to play her own quiet game and keep what she knew to herself. She wondered why. Perhaps she was falling in love with this adventures. Yes, that must be it. She was in love with him—in love with a bandit!

Sylvia's imagination had traveled so swiftly and so far that it came to earth with a crash when Marcia opened the door.

It was not alone the buffeting of the salt breeze nor the exhilaration of walking against it that had transformed her into something radiantly lovely. From within glowed a strange fire that made her another creature altogether.

"Why—why—Marcia!" breathed Sylvia, bewildered.

"I've had such a glorious walk, dear!" cried Marcia. "The fog has lifted and the sky is a sheet of amethyst and gold."

"Did the men get the boat off?"

"Yes. She is floating tranquilly as a dove."

"What is her name?"

"'My Unknown Lady.'"

"Mercy on us! That ought to satisfy even Elisha."

"It did," said Marcia.

CHAPTER V

Sylvia's plans, so well laid and apparently so easy of execution, did not, to her chagrin, work out, for instead of awaking and demanding supper Stanley Heath slept without a break until morning.

Sun was tinting the lavender sands to rose and gilding the water with its first flecks of gold when she saw Marcia standing at the foot of her bed.

"Mr. Heath has a high fever and can scarcely speak aloud," explained she. "I'm afraid he is quite ill. I wish you'd call up Doctor Stetson."

"Mercy on us!"

The girl, drowsy and heavy-eyed, sprang out of bed.

"I'll be down in just a minute," she exclaimed. "How do you happen to be up so early?"

"I've been up off and on all night," answered Marcia. "Mr. Heath was restless and thirsty. About midnight I heard him tossing about, and thinking he might be hungry, I heated some broth and took it to him. He declares he is going back to New York today."

"But he can't—he mustn't."

"He is determined to. He says he has something very important to attend to. Of course I have no authority over him but perhaps Doctor Stetson can exert some. That is why I am anxious to reach him before he goes out," explained Marcia, moving toward the door.

"I will call him right away."

"I'll go down and start breakfast, then. Mr. Heath is dozing. He has promised not to get up for at least an hour. We must have the doctor here within that time."

"I'll tell him to hurry."

Marcia tiptoed down the stairs.

Hezikiah Puts the Bankers Right Up a Creek, Yassah!

Hezikiah Brown, colored, lost a foreclosure action to a Topeka bank. The judgment gave the bank title to 19 of the 20 acres in Hezikiah's plat adjoining Shunganunga creek. Kansas law permits a defendant to retain one acre of his own choosing as his homestead, the only string being it must all be in one piece.

Hezikiah chose a 15-foot strip starting at the creek bank and running around the outer edge of the property back to the creek. To reach their land, the bankers must row a boat across or wade up the Shunganunga.

WHO ELSE WANTS TO FORGET SOUR STOMACH?

THE way to eat favorite foods and avoid heartburn, sour stomach, gas and other symptoms of acid indigestion is no secret now. Millions carry Tums. Nothing to mix up. No drenching your stomach with harsh alkalies, which doctors say may increase the tendency toward acid indigestion. Just enough of the antacid in Tums is released to neutralize the stomach. The rest passes on inert. Cannot over-alkalize the stomach or blood. You never know when, so carry a roll always. 10c at all druggists.

Rid Yourself of Kidney Poisons

DO you suffer burning, scanty or too frequent urination; backache, headache, dizziness, loss of energy, leg pains, swellings and puffiness under the eyes? Are you tired, nervous—feel all unstrung and don't know what is wrong?

Then give some thought to your kidneys. Be sure they function properly for functional kidney disorder permits excess waste to stay in the blood, and to poison and upset the whole system.

Use Doan's Pills. Doan's are for the kidneys only. They are recommended the world over. You can get the genuine, time-tested Doan's at any drug store.

Don't Entrust Your Own or Your Family's Well-Being to Unknown Preparations

THE person to ask whether the preparation you or your family are taking for the relief of headaches is SAFE to use regularly is your family doctor. Ask him particularly about Genuine BAYER ASPIRIN.

He will tell you that before the discovery of Bayer Aspirin most "pain" remedies were advised against by physicians as bad for the stomach and, often, for the heart. Which is food for thought if you seek quick, safe relief.

Scientists rate Bayer Aspirin among the fastest methods yet discovered for the relief of headaches and the pains of rheumatism, neuritis and neuralgia. And the experience of millions of users has proved it safe for the average person to use regularly. In your own interest remember this.

You can get Genuine Bayer Aspirin at any drug store — simply by asking for it by its full name, BAYER ASPIRIN. Make it a point to do this — and see that you get what you want.

No Need to Suffer "Morning Sickness"

"Morning sickness"—is caused by an acid condition. To avoid it, acid must be offset by alkalis—such as magnesia.

Why Physicians Recommend Milnesia Wafers

These mint-flavored, candy-like wafers are pure milk of magnesia in solid form—the most pleasant way to take it. Each wafer is approximately equal to a full adult dose of liquid milk of magnesia. Chewed thoroughly, then swallowed, they correct acidity in the mouth and throughout the digestive system and insure quick, complete elimination of the waste matters that cause gas, headaches, bloated feelings and a dozen other discomforts.

Milnesia Wafers come in bottles of 20 and 48, at 35c and 60c respectively, and in convenient tins for your handbag containing 12 at 20c. Each wafer is approximately one adult dose of milk of magnesia. All good drug stores sell and recommend them.

The Original Milk of Magnesia Wafers

With the Minnesota Lawmakers

Legislative interest in unemployment insurance wavered perceptibly as the proposal was subjected to a day of stiff debate in both houses and the Minnesota Farm Bureau federation in a formal resolution urged its rejection. Although house proponents clung steadfastly to a hope they can corral enough votes to pass it in the lower branch the plan was attacked from so many angles in the senate that its chief sponsor, Senator Gerald T. Mullin of Minneapolis, admitted a grave concern over its outcome.

Two co-authors, Senators Karl G. Neumeier of Stillwater and Val Imm of Mankato, took their names off the bill because of the exemption of employes from contributing to the fund. In the house, however, proponents beat off numerous efforts to alter its provisions, although it was forced into much acrimonious debate. The state farm bureau federation resolution was thrust before the legislators in the midst of the senate arguments. Representatives of 72 county bureaus approved it during a session at the Lowry hotel.

It pointed out rural opposition to unemployment insurance because it will require a 3 per cent tax on pay rolls, totaling $10,000,000 a year which will be paid by the consumers in an increased cost of the goods they buy, and the benefits will be limited to a small percentage of the people of the state and the burden borne by all the people. The resolution went on to assert that only nine states have adopted an unemployment insurance act, with eight states refusing. "There is no immediate necessity for the present enactment of this law," the resolution said, explaining that should it become necessary, it can be postponed to the 1937 session.

A six-week time extension for the deadline upon which all Minnesota motorists must pay their 1936 automobile license fees was proposed to the state house of representatives by Representative John A. Weeks, Minneapolis. The present deadline is February 15.

The house unanimously passed a bonus claims bill. The bill calls for payment of $42,500 to conscientious objectors during the World war. It now goes to the senate.

Salaries for legislators called into special session would be paid by the state under a bill approved and advanced to the calendar by the house. Introduced by Representative Albert Kueffner, St. Paul, the measure provides for payment of $10 a day for each working day the legislators are in session. Under existing laws, members cannot be paid for special sessions. The bill would be effective February 1, 1937.

The Minnesota house sub-committee working on the unemployment insurance bill expects to get the measure ready for presentation shortly. The group re-defined an employer as one who hires eight persons for 20 weeks of the year. Under the first senate draft of the measure an employer was one hiring four persons for 13 weeks of the yar. The re-defining of the term was a concession by the house group. In exchange, those who objected to the original definition conceded an amendment changing from January 1, 1936, to May 1, 1936, the date of which employees would start making contributions to the unemployment insurance fund.

The house advanced to the calendar, subject to amendment, the Walter Liggett reward bill, which already has been passed by the state senate. It provides for payment of rewards of $2,500 for each of three convictions, payments to be made at the discretion of the district judge upon conviction of the slayer or slayers of the weekly newspaper publisher. Mrs. Liggett is eligible to receive a reward under the house version of the measure, which, as passed by the senate, provided only for a lump sum of $7,500 to be paid the person aiding in the conviction of the slayer.

Legislative fears that old age pension costs will run into monumental figures from the start were allayed in assurances from statisticians that the outlay until July 1, 1937, will not exceed $6,300,000. This figure was presented to the senate tax committee in connection with consideration of the old age pension bill tossed to it recently just as the senate was to take its final roll call. The committee promptly referred it back to the main body with a recommendation for passage.

Income tax returns of taxpayers could be examined by county auditors, assessors, county commissioners and members of the legislature under a bill introduced in the house.

Pensions for needy adult blind in the state were approved by the house when it passed the measure under which eligibles can receive $30 monthly. Representative Henry Horwitz, St. Paul is author of the bill. It simply placed needy adult blind persons on a pension basis instead of on a relief basis as now. Under existing statutes only $15 a month is paid

what Irvin S. Cobb thinks about:

The Faculty Flag Pledge

SANTA MONICA, CALIF.—I never heard of a law compelling a private individual in times of peace to take an oath to defend our flag and respect our institutions. Neither do I know of laws compelling us to give public jobs to men and women who refuse to take such an oath or requiring us to leave them in their jobs should they violate that oath. From the President of this country on down, the run of officeholders must swear to uphold the Constitution and support the government. Should any one of them wilfully fail to do so, the offender is liable to removal—amid loud cheers! Then why not include teachers and college professors, those whose high task it is to mould youth into stuff fit for citizenship and civic responsibility?

Irvin S. Cobb

Why should they be suffered to peddle sedition and yet go on drawing salaries from the public fund—these people who claim they have conscientious scruples when what most of us think they really suffer from is Communistic biliousness? And for the students, as I understand it, the right of free speech and the gift of free education do not mean license to spout treason on a campus or scorn America in a classroom.

A red flag fits an auction sale, but I don't believe I'd ever get used to seeing it afloat over a district schoolhouse.

Political Plagiarism

POLITICS certainly produces copycats. First, the young Republicans meet, being greeted by a typical bounding juvenile, who's the last surviving drummer boy of Shiloh. Then the young Democrats come rallying as fast as wheelchairs will bring them, with their breakfast shawls and their ear-trumpets. The self-proclaimed "young" leader of any party is usually somebody who hopes to set a patriotic example to his grandchildren and at the same time get the old job back.

The Republicans hold a Grass-Roots convention. So this month at Atlanta there'll be what you might call a grass-widow convention for the revolting southern Democrats—absolutely too revolting for words, to hear Jim Farley talk. You see, they've been divorced, but the decree is not yet final.

Southern Democrats are great hands for seceding and remaining so every day in the year except just one day. On election, they become reconciled long enough to vote the straight Democratic ticket. Twenty minutes later, they're off the reservation again. I hear a number of bankers will attend. This would seem to indicate a changing trend. For quite a while after 1929, very few bankers went to Atlanta voluntarily.

Going Nuts in Hollywood

IF, WHILE touring Los Angeles, you see a bushy-headed, wild-eyed, elderly gentleman aimlessly wandering about, don't jump too soon at the conclusion that he's a typical specimen of our famous coterie of hermits.

You see, they laid out Los Angeles and environs on the ground-plan of a drunken angleworm, and the system of numbering houses is further designed to encourage raving insanity. So what you behold may merely be an ex-resident of the Middle West, who came out here years ago to retire and bought him a cozy bungalow and incautiously went for a stroll and has been trying ever since to find his way back home again.

Not all the nuts were nutty when they first arrived. Many of them got that way trying to trace street addresses. After a year and a half here, I'm beginning to have trouble with the knee-reflexes myself.

But there's one consolation about going crazy in Hollywood. Unless you leave town, nobody would ever notice it.

Gen. Liggett's Passing

SO HUNTER LIGGETT is dead at seventy-eight—the only contemporary lieutenant general of the United States army. For 50-odd years, he wore with gallantry and with honor the uniform of his country.

He fought Indians; fought border-bandits; fought Spaniards in Cuba; fought Germans in France; and, at the end, fought off death for many dragging months.

I saw him overseas, commanding our splendid First corps, which he made more splendid still. He was as plain as an old shoe, and as easy to get along with. His officers respected him, his soldiers loved him. They went where he sent 'em, and if they failed in their objective, they didn't come back. They went instead to report at the sills of the judgment seat the reason why they failed.

Behind his back, the Buck privates called him "Uncle Ligg"—that ought to give you the idea.

They'll like him over there—Israel Putnam, and Stonewall Jackson, and Forrest, and Grant, and all the rest of our real ones.

Killing of White Rhino Highly Arouses Natives

Illegal killing of a white rhinoceros, one of the rarest species of animals in the world, in Mahlabatini has aroused all that part of South Africa and an extensive hunt for the culprits started as soon as officials were informed.

The killing, for which natives are believed to be responsible, has caused considerable official interest, because of the recent killing of numbers of game, including hippopotami. It is believed that the rhino, which was one of a comparatively small herd of less than 200, was shot at close range, and that the poachers were disturbed at their work. As soon as the killing was known steps were taken to preserve the carcass which is valuable.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

The Great Fire of London caused damage estimated at $45,000,000. Each year, the damage caused by fires in Britain now exceeds that amount.

DOCTORS KNOW

Mothers read this:

THREE STEPS TO RELIEVING CONSTIPATION
I II III
A cleansing dose today; a smaller quantity tomorrow; less each time, until bowels need no help at all.

The answer is simple, and it's the answer to all your bowel worries if you will only realize it: many doctors and hospitals use liquid laxatives.

If you knew what a doctor knows, you would use only the liquid form. A liquid can always be taken in gradually reduced doses. Reduced dosage is the secret of any real relief from constipation.

Ask a doctor about this. Ask your druggist how very popular liquid laxatives have become. They give the right kind of help, and right amount of help. The liquid laxative generally used is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. It contains senna and cascara — both natural laxatives that can form no habit, even in children. So, try Syrup Pepsin. You just take regulated doses till Nature restores regularity.

Moose Chases Man, But Only Wants to be Fed

Bagley—The moose chased the man into the barn, but the animal wasn't ferocious—he just wanted to be fed. When the animal started for him, however, Hildar Hawkinson didn't know it was quite tame, and received quite a scare. Hawkinson, employed at a sawmill near Bagley, got up in the morning to care for the horses, but when about half way to the barns he heard brush nearby crackling and stopped to investigate. To his astonishment, he saw that the animal making the noise was a large moose. Moose are exceedingly scarce in that vicinity, the last one being reported a year ago. Hawkinson ran for the barn and slammed the door on the moose. When he peeked thru a window the moose stood outside, disgusted because it had failed to catch him. Since then Hawkinson has learned that the moose is quite tame, and now he feeds it every morning.

Barnyard Records Fall At Moose Lake

Moose Lake—An epidemic of records among the barnyards near Moose Lake is providing a fertile source of interesting items. A short time ago Seymour Kalm reported that one of his cows had aroused the envy of the entire female membership of bovine world by giving birth to three identical bull calves. No sooner had this event gone the rounds than a pullet belonging to Charles Hoglund laid an egg of which an ostrich would have been justly proud, in a determined effort to bring the records back to the fowl kingdom. Now comes the record breaker of them all: Iver Williams, two miles north of Kettle River, brought in an egg produced by an April hatched Leghorn pullet that tipped the scales at the amazing total of four ounces. It measured 7 3-4 inches the long way and 6 1-2 inches the short way. As if to make sure of retaining the record for Kettle River, another hen brought forth an egg within an egg! Inside one egg, which had a complete white and yolk, was still another one, complete with a yolk, white and shell. Another record of some sort was established by another hen, altho she did little boasting of it, when her effort was repaid with a midget egg which weighed less than one-third of an ounce.

Writes 132 Insurance Policies in One Day

Albert Lea—The "small" total of 132 insurance policies written in one day kept Finn Nannestad of Albert Lea and a half a dozen doctors of that town humping last week and made Nannestad the champion insurance writer of the world. The former record of a Nebraska man, who wrote 122 policies in a 24 hour period, was bettered by 10 applications. The 132 applications represent $200,000 worth of business with premiums approximately $5,000. Nannestad worked over the list of applications for some time, of course, but had them all ready to turn in on one particular day, and each applicant had to be examined for the policy on the day they were turned in. Physicians stated that it was one of the biggest days in the history of Albert Lea for "Patients".

Wild Fox Trails Man Near Faribault

Faribault—This "fox trailing man" business resembles too closely that old story of "man bites dog" to let slip unnoticed, even tho it humbles the pride of two famous "varmint" hunters of Faribault. Paul Mullenmeister and Douglas Brand set out equipped with five lusty fox hounds and a shotgun apiece. It wasn't long before the pack struck a fresh trail. One of the dogs has a voice like a slide trombone, and the others all join in close harmony. All this racket attracted two small farm boys to the scene. They approached Brand as he plodded along in the general direction of the baying hounds. One of the lads looked behind Brand and asked, "What kind of a dog is that, mister?" Brand glanced back to see a fox mincing along in his footsteps. He whirled and let drive with an appropriate epithet, and a load of number 4 shot with it. The fox spun around and set off at top speed. Mullenmeister shot as he passed and spun him again, but the fox straightened out and hasn't been seen since.

IOWA CO-OP DAIRY UNION LABOR BACKS

Clinton, Ia.—The cooperative dairy formed by union milk drivers who quit their jobs rather than sign a wage-cutting and blacklisting contract with their old boss, has received the indorsement of the organized labor movement of Clinton.

By voting to patronize only the Rainbow Dairy, the new co-op venture, the Tri-City Labor Congress has helped to make it the largest dairy business in town within two weeks of its organization.

Eleven of the 13 founders had to mortgage their homes to float the dairy, having taken over a small plant that was in financial straits.

Northwest Station Offers Free Seed Test

As a result of the severe epidemic of black stem rust last year, many of the wheat seed stocks now on hand are of light weight and questionable value. To assist the farmers of Northwestern Minnesota in deciding whether their seed is worth planting the Northwest Experiment Station offers a free testing service. It is expected that a large number will take advantage of this service and all are urged to send in samples early. Only those samples complying with the following suggestions can be tested:

1. The sample must come from land located in the following Northwestern Minnesota counties: Kittson, Roseau, Lake of the Woods, Marshall, Pennington, Red Lake, Polk, Clearwater, Norman, Mahnomen, Clay, Becker, Otter Tail and Wilkin.
2. The samples are limited to wheat.
3. The number of samples is limited to five from any individual or company.
4. The sample must be cleaned and graded as for sowing.
5. The sample should weigh about a pound should be representative of the seed stock, and should be carefully packed so as to arrive in good condition.
6. The sample should be sent prepaid to Grain Testing Laboratory, Northwest School and Station, Crookston, Minnesota, and be clearly labeled with the sender's name and address.

The sample will then be tested for percentage of germination and vigor of sprouts. No purity tests can be made. Reports will be made as soon as possible. For further details farmers are requested to consult their county agent.

Females Make the Noise

When you hear a mallard quacking in the marsh at night, it is the female duck you hear. The drake utters only a reedy quack, audible for but a short distance.

STEP LADDERS NEEDED TO HUSK STATE CORN

Clinton—Farmers in Big Stone county are producing a Paul Bunyan corn crop this year, and in many places throughout this section the fields tower well over 10 feet in height. Ears on the corn are so high up on the stalk that farmers will almost need the aid of a stepladder to husk their corn this fall. If frost does not touch the corn for a week or two the corn crop will be one of the best in the history of Big Stone county. The corn this year got off to a slow start, but after the 4th of July it made great gains. Farmers will not have to cut very large pieces to get enough to fill their silos according to reports received.

HE HAS AN INTERESTING OLD RAZOR

Isle—D. H. Kennedy, Isle barber, is displaying to his patrons a razor that has shaved William McKinley and Theodore Roosevelt. Long since retired from use because honing has worn it too narrow to hold lather, Mr. Kennedy treasures the old blade as a keepsake. It was when Mr. Kennedy was proprietor of an eight-chair shop in Superior, Wis., about thirty-five years ago that he shaved Roosevelt, who was in the city campaigning for the presidency. Five years later he used it in smoothing the handsome features of McKinley, also in Superior on a presidential campaign. Mr. Kennedy purchased the razor in Chicago about forty-two years ago.

120 CHICKS STOLEN, THEN BROUGHT BACK

Fairmont — One hundred and twenty chickens stolen from the farm of Paul Kasal in Mower county, came back home to roost and officers are puzzled. The thieves took all but a few chickens on the place. Sheriff Ira Syck was called. He and his deputy scoured the neighborhood and questioned many persons in the hope of finding clues. The next day Mrs. Kasal was surprised to see the chickens walking around the farmyard. It is thought the thieves became frightened by possible apprehension, brought back to the poultry and turned them loose near the farm.

QUIT BUSINESS OR DIE, ANONYMOUS NOTE SAYS

Hackensack—A letter threatening him with death has been received by Clarence Kendall, merchant at Hackensack, the only condition on which his life depends being that he must cease business in that town. "You must close your store in 30 days or you will be dead," read the pencilled note, which was signed "Remember." The letter was received late in August, but authorities stated they could not take any criminal action on the note because it made no demand for money. Kendall, although admitting that it might be someone's idea of a joke, asserted it was no joke to him, and has promised prosecution if the sender's name is found. He has denied that it is a publicity stunt.

Keep the Foreign Junk Out

Nearly half a billion dollars' worth of farm products have been imported into this country in the last six months, about $50 lost to each of our ten million farmers. Others may believe that is good for this country. We do not agree. Give us the power and we would do what the late "Fire Alarm" Flanagan of Carthage used to say he wanted done—"make the tariff not for revenue, but high enough to keep the damn foreign junk out of here."—Nevada, Mo., Herald.

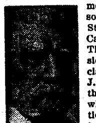
Supreme Court Finds AAA Unconstitutional—Democrats Pick Philadelphia for Convention—Bonus Measure Is Pushed Through House.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD
© Western Newspaper Union.

SIX justices of the United States Supreme court, including Chief Justice Hughes, joined in an opinion that killed the Agricultural Adjustment act. Three associate justices, Stone, Brandeis and Cardozo, dissented. The majority decision, read by Associate Justice Owen J. Roberts, held that the AAA was wholly unconstitutional because it invaded the rights of the states in seeking to control farm production. The whole system of processing taxes imposed to finance the program was swept into discard.



Chief Justice Hughes

Not only are the processing taxes illegal but the court apparently declared the farm benefit contracts void and put up bars against any attempt of the federal government to regulate farm production by whatever means.

Senators and representatives who immediately began planning legislation to continue benefit payments to farmers and to balance agricultural output did not seem to grasp the full significance of this part of the decision. The court said flatly that regulation of farm production is not within the scope of the federal government and of its powers to accomplish this, nor can it purchase adherence to a control scheme by federal payments.

The decision destroyed not only the original AAA but also the amended act of the last session of congress.

The dissenting opinion held that the AAA was a legitimate employment of the power to tax for the general welfare. It attacked the theory that the preservation of our institutions is the exclusive concern of the Supreme court and suggested that under the majority decision the unemployment work relief act is unconstitutional.

AAA Administrator Chester Davis stopped all payments to farmers "until further notice," and the Treasury department ordered all collectors of internal revenue to desist from further efforts to collect processing taxes.

In his budget message President Roosevelt included revenue from processing taxes, so the Supreme court decision had the effect of throwing the 1937 budget still further out of balance by something like a billion dollars.

IN HIS speech at the $50 a plate Jackson day dinner in Washington, President Roosevelt declined to comment on the Supreme court decision killing the AAA. "It is enough to say," he said, "that the attainment of justice and prosperity for American agriculture remains an immediate and constant objective of my administration."

Secretary Wallace called into consultation at Washington about 100 representatives of farm organizations to try to formulate some plan for speedy legislation to supplant the discredited law. Assurance that farmers who have fulfilled contract agreements would be paid was given by President Roosevelt when he advised administration leaders in congress to push through a $250,000,000 appropriation.

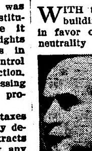
Clarification of the status of $1,200,000,000 paid in taxes by processors was expected when the court decides the eight rice processing tax cases argued recently. Legal experts in congress said an act of congress would be required if the $979,000,000 in processing taxes paid into the treasury are to be refunded. Disposition of the $200,000,000 processing taxes impounded in federal courts probably will hinge on decision in the rice cases.

AUCTIONED off to the highest bidder, the Democratic national convention of 1936 was sold to Philadelphia by the party's national committee. The price was $200,000, plus some prizes and concessions. Chicago and San Francisco also bid for the convention. The former offered a certified check for $150,000. The California city made the same bid and later raised it to $202,500.

During a brief recess Chairman Farley telephoned, presumably to the White House, and Vice President Garner moved among members of the committee urging the selection of Philadelphia. Therefore the City of Brotherly Love won the prize. The opening of the convention was set for June 23, two weeks after the Republican convention in Cleveland.

NO TIME was lost in putting through the house the bonus measure that had been agreed upon by veterans' organizations and approved by the ways and means committee. It carries the name of the Vinson-Patman-McCormack bill and is a compromise that authorizes immediate payment of the bonus but offers no definite plan for raising the money. It would provide 3 per cent interest until 1945 for veterans refraining from cashing their adjusted service certificates at once, and cancel all interest still due on loans on the certificates.

WITH the obvious intention of building up public sentiment in favor of the special brand of neutrality legislation he desires, Senator Nye had before his senate munitions committee for several days J. P. Morgan, Thomas W. Lamont and other members of the great Morgan banking company. Nye and Stephen Raushenbusch, investigator for the committee, sought to prove that the United States was drawn into the World war by the loans made to the allies by Morgan & Co. and its associates. The testimony concerning these loans and their implications was long and complicated. The financiers were well prepared for the inquiry and were armed with a great quantity of documents, and though there was a good deal of acrimonious talk, Mr. Morgan appeared entirely unperturbed.

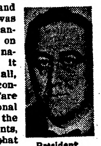


J. P. Morgan.

WHEN the delegates to the naval conference in London resumed their deliberations Admiral Osami Nagano, chief representative of Japan, firmly repeated his demand that Great Britain and the United States concede the parity claims of Japan as preliminary to any agreement. This attitude stopped all discussion of the British, French and Italian proposal for exchange of information about naval building plans and threatened the conference with early collapse. The crisis was so serious that Foreign Secretary Anthony Eden himself took a part in the affair, calling the Japanese to his office in an attempt to induce them to adopt a more conciliatory attitude.

Japanese spokesmen declared they were interested first and last in the total tonnage question—under which they demand equality—and were not at all interested in other aspects of naval limitations to which the conference sought to turn.

SURROUNDED by klieg lights, microphones and movie cameras, President Roosevelt stood before the senate and house in night joint session and delivered what was nominally his annual message on the state of the nation. Actually it was not that at all, but a statement concerning the welfare and international disturbances on the other continents, followed by what the press generally considered an eloquent and militant political speech addressed to the people of the United States, who by the millions were listening in on their radios.



President Roosevelt

Democrats and Republicans alike commended the President's opening paragraph in which he boldly condemned the aggression of Italy and Japan, though without naming those nations; and there was little dissent from his assertion that the United States must maintain its neutrality while seeking to "discourage the use by belligerent nations of any and all American products calculated to facilitate the prosecution of a war in quantities over and above our normal exports to them in time of peace."

The remainder of the message, devoted to domestic affairs, was devoted chiefly to a belligerently worded defense of the New Deal measures of the administration, an attack on those who oppose them and a spirited passage in which Mr. Roosevelt defied and dared his critics to move for the repeal of those measures instead of "hiding their dissent in a cowardly cloak of generality." In only two paragraphs did the President dwell on "the state of the nation." In these he said that after nearly three years of the New Deal national income is increasing, agriculture and industry are "returning to full activity," and "we approach a balance of the national budget." That last statement was greeted with mocking laughter from the Republican side of the chamber, and though the Democrats cheered loudly, Mr. Roosevelt himself smiled at his words.

IN HIS message to congress submitting his approved budget for the 1937 fiscal year, beginning July 1 next, President Roosevelt followed the double system of accounting his administration has always employed—one set of books for regular expenditures and income and another set for emergency spending and appropriations. He asserted that receipts from all sources in the next fiscal year will aggregate an estimated $5,654,000,000. Expenditures for all regular government departments are estimated at $5,649,000,000. So the "regular" budget will be in balance, with a surplus of $5,000,000.

But the message went on to say, after explaining that the regular government books will show fiscal affairs in the black as to income and outgo, they will show red to the extent of $1,103,000,000 in works-relief spending, less the $5,000,000 "surplus," this leaving the new appropriation for further works-relief open for at least two months.

That figure of $1,103,000,000 represents the President's estimate of unexpended balances on July 1 from the $4,880,00,000 and previous emergency appropriations. It does not take into account probable new appropriations for similar purposes yet to be determined.

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

When roads are slippery, it is harder to stop a car and extra care is necessary on the part of the driver and pedestrian. If you are walking, be extra careful at intersections. Even though traffic must stop, it may be impossible for the driver to bring a car to a halt at the right place.

If you are driving your car in slippery weather, remember that the car is not completely under your control. Even moderate speed may be dangerous. Exercise more care at intersections and in turning corners. Unless it is absolutely necessary to use the car, leave it in the garage. You will be safer.

Municipal Officials in Northwest Minn. to Meet

Municipal officials from fourteen counties in the northwestern section of Minnesota will attend a regional conference sponsored by the League of Minnesota Municipalities in cooperation with the City of Crookston on February 6.

Invitations have been sent to ninety-six cities and villages within driving distance of Crookston. In addition to city and village officials, delegates are expected from counties and townships. Mayor W. J. Kirkwood of Crookston is extending invitations on behalf of his city. Any person interested in municipal government is cordially invited to attend.

Delegates in attendance will be able to combine this meeting with the attractions of the Red River Valley Winter Shows which will be in session for five days, February 3 to 7, inclusive. Following the procedure at previous regional conferences, no formal program has been arranged, although it is expected that Senator Elmer A. Benson, who will be a guest at the Shows, will meet with the municipal officials at one session.

"FLOYD OF ROSEDALE", the prize Iowa hog recently won by Governor Floyd B. Olson in a friendly wager with Governor Clyde Herring of Iowa, over the outcome of the Minnesota-Iowa football game, will be on display in the livestock barns throughout the week of the Red River Valley Winter Shows, February 3 to 7. Livestock breeders throughout this area are anxious to compare their hogs with the Iowa product.

Upon delivery of the hog by Governor Herring in Governor Olson's office in the state capitol, Congressman R. T. Buckler invited the Governor to display his prize at the Winter Shows. However the pig was offered to the winner of an essay contest on the subject, "Opportunities for Youth on the Farm." The winner of the covet prize was Richard Jones of Austin, Minnesota, who later sold the pig to the University of Minnesota. Through the courtesy of Professor E. F. Ferrin of the Animal Husbandry division, the hog will be shipped by express to the Winter Shows where O. M. Kiser, secretary of the Livestock Association, has prepared a special pen for the Iowa blue blood. "Floyd of Rosedale" will be the center of attraction through Winter Shows week which opens next Monday.

Mussolini--23 Years Ago

In answer to numerous requests from newspapers, as well as friends and sympathizers throughout the country, we are reproducing the following item in our bulletin No. 21, September 27, 1935:

"The nationalist, conservative and clerical Italy of today wants to make her sword her law and the army the school of the nation. We foresaw this moral degeneration and therefore are not surprised by it. But those who believe that this dominance of militarism is a sign of strength are mistaken. Strong peoples have no need to suffer such rubbish as the Italian press indulges in with foolish delight. Strong peoples have themselves in check. Nationalist and militarist Italy shows that she has herself not in check. A little war of conquest is celebrated as a Roman triumph."

BROADCAST BASKETBALL GAME OVER TELEPHONE

Bertha: A play-by-play description of the Clarissa-Bertha basketball game was relayed over telephone wires and through a loud speaker into the Adolph Herseth home when that family was quarantined recently. It was probably one of the first times this has ever been accomplished, and Bertha is proud of its new broadcasting station, BTC, or Bertha Telephone Co. M. H. Millner of the telephone exchange at Bertha, arranged for the broadcast system when interest ran strong in the Herseth home and they were not allowed outside the house because of the quarantine. It is now being said that Ted Husing of the CBS has a rival in the field, none other than Announcer Mike Millner of BTC.

FISH CROWD INTO SMALL SPACE IN LAKE FOR AIR

Fergus Falls: Because of almost certain suffocation, about 12,000 pickerel have been removed from Gourd Lake, near Fergus Falls. In the spring of the year a great many pickerel make their way from the Leaf Lakes to Gourd Lake through a small creek. After spawning, the fish return to Leaf Lakes. Their off-spring, however, remain in the muddy and shallow waters of Gourd Lake and many of them perish. A large spring at one point of the lake has kept a small area open, and thousands of pickerel, measuring from 12 to 14 inches long, have crowded into this open space for air. With the use of a net, Warden J. O. Lewis has been able to capture any amount of fish. These have been distributed to other lakes in the county.

MATCHES IN PANTS IGNITE WHEN BOWLING

Mahnomen: Bowling may be a great sport and fine exercise, but to Mervin Hanson it's too hot. He feels that way after a rather warm session at the bowling alleys in Mahnomen. For a while, in fact, he figured that he ought to call the fire department or find a barrel of water. It all happened this way. Hanson was bowling in his usual good style. But in one of his pockets he carried a load of matches. After his turn on the alleys was over, he hastily slid himself onto one of the benches to watch the others roll. The friction caused the matches to ignite and if it hadn't been for his quick response to the "heat", some of the boys would have been out looking for a barrel. Fortunately, he was able to extinguish the blaze in his pants pocket before very much damage was done.

PASSENGER TRAIN KILLS FIVE HORSES

Park Rapids: Five horses owned by Charles H. Smith near Park Rapids were killed last week when struck by the passenger train. The animals had wandered away from the home place in the storm the previous day and were on the right of way near a highway crossing when struck. Three of the horses were killed outright, and two with broken legs were later shot by deputy sheriff Glen Larson. A sixth horse was uninjured. The animals were valued by Smith at about $500.

"FOLKS, AMELIA EARHART!" —FOUND IT REALLY WAS!

Chaska: A woman driving thru Farmington stopped at a filling station for some gas. The attendant was busy, so his wife proceeded to give the feminine autoist service. The stranger showed a great resemblance to Amelia Earhart, the famous flyer, and the Farmington woman told her so. Then an idea come into the station attendant's wife's head. "I have some ladies in the house, and I want to play a joke on them. Come in the house. I'll introduce you as the famous woman pilot, and they'll never know the difference." Obligingly, the driver agreed. And the big joke of the whole thing was that it was later learned that this stranger WAS Amelia Earhart.

FIREMAN GROOMS FOR HUMAN TORCH ROLE

North St. Paul: When a fireman takes afire, that's news. Andrew Kasper came perilously close to making the headlines in the role of a human firebrand when his co-workers on the North St. Paul fire department were forced to focus a hose, shooting cold water at him as they battled a garage fire near that village. In efforts to prevent the spread of the flames to the house nearby, the fire fighters were forced to work at such close quarters with the blaze that Kasper's heat-saturated clothing began to smoke. Timely inundation from the hose prevented him from going up in smoke, it was reported.

75 Persons In Marshall Co. Eligible For Old Age Pensions

Marshall county has 75 persons eligible for old age pensions under the new federal social security plan now befor the special session of the state legislature, according to a survey by L. P. Zimmerman, SERA administrator.

In a report to the legislature Mr. Zimmerman pointed out that Marshall county is one of the counties not paying old age pensions at the present time. and it has 86 more than 65 years old on relief, 4 between 60 and 65 years old on relief, and 68 not receiving pensions who would be eligible for old age payments at the present time if relief were not available and county finances permitted the payments.

The total population of Marshall county, based on the 1930 U. S. census is 17,003, with 1,210 individuals or 7.1 percent of the total population more than 65 years old. On this basis 6.2 percent of all persons more than 65 years old in the county would be eligible for the new pension.

While the federal plan contemplates a pension of not less than $30 a month to individuals, Marshall county is now paying nothing.

There are 47 counties in the state now paying old age pensions, the average of which is $9.89 a month with the average lowest payment $6.05 a month and the average highest payment $19.99. A total of 36 counties are not paying pensions.

NOTICE!

Bells Have Played a Great Part in History of the World

Served as Harbingers of Both Good and Bad Tidings.

"Bells have played no small part in history," says a bulletin from the Washington, D. C., headquarters of the National Geographic society.

"Among the many renowned bells whose ringing has ushered in new chapters in the story of mankind is the Liberty bell, most beloved historical relic of the United States," the bulletin continues. "Prior to its cracking, the Liberty bell had a very active 'voice' in the affairs of the nation. Its most far reaching utterance was that of July 8, 1776, when it announced the public reading of the Declaration of Independence which had been formally adopted by the Continental congress on July 4, 1776.

Liberty Bell Hidden Under Floor.

"Threatened with British capture, it was removed from the tower of Independence hall on September 18, 1777, and hidden beneath a church floor in Allentown, Pa., for almost a year. Rehung in the tower, it pealed for festivals and anniversaries until its fatal accident in 1835, when it cracked as it was being tolled for the funeral procession of Chief Justice John Marshall.

"Other historic bells treasured by Philadelphia are the chimes which ring from the steeple of old Christ church.

"In Sicily, in the Thirteenth century, nearly 8,000 Frenchmen listened stolidly to the ringing of the Sicilian vespers, unaware that the bells were signals for their cold-blooded massacre. In the Sixteenth century France, clamor of bells cried the beginning of the murder of thousands of Huguenots.

Bells Warned of Floods.

"Among England's most appealing legends about bells is that of the Bow bells in London. When young Dick Whittington, hungry and destitute, was leaving London to seek his fortune elsewhere, it is said the bells of this old church rang out and seemed to say: 'Turn again Whittington, thrice lord mayor of London.' It is a familiar tale of how, cheered by them, he returned, found work and later actually became lord mayor.

"William the Conqueror enters the history of bells through being the first to strictly enforce the rule that all lights and fires should be extinguished when the warning bell rang at eight o'clock. As late as the Nineteenth century, in many European towns, ringing of the curfew (couvre-feu or 'cover fire') was simultaneous with the squealing of numerous door hinges as shopkeepers hastened to obey the law.

"But bells used to strike terror to the hearts of people in the Netherlands. When, in the silence of the night, bells jangled madly from the sentinel's watch tower, soldiers swarmed to repel approaching invaders, or townspeople rushed to repair a breaking dyke.

"Ship captains today, plowing through a heavy sea, listen for the ominous clanging of bell buoys, rocking in the heavy surf, which warn of dangerous reefs.

Bells Given as Rewards.

"In Russia, during whirling snowstorms that blot out house lights villagers ring bells to guide lost travelers. Siberian carriages and sleighs are drawn by teams of three, or even seven horses, the midde horse galloping beneath a big wooden arch from which hang numerous bells.

"Although old Russia was called 'The Land of Bells,' it did not have a monopoly on them. Our pioneer forefathers rambled over the prairies in Conestoga wagons to the lilting chimes of bells swaying above their horses' shoulders. These bells frequently served as rewards. If a wagon broke down, its driver often gave its bells to the wagoners who assisted him."

SYNOPSIS

The future of the still youthful and comely "Widder" Marcia Howe, recently released by death from her idling husband, is a conversational tit-bit among housewives of the little hamlet of Wilton. Eligible bachelors and widowers also are interested. Marcia is lonely, and has invited her late husband's niece, Sylvia Hayden, whom she had never seen, to visit her. A stranger, on the verge of exhaustion, finds his way to Marcia's home. Secretly, he asks Marcia to hide a package containing jewelry. She does so. Elisha Winslow, town sheriff, brings news of a jewel robbery nearby. The stranger gives his name as Stanley Heath. Sylvia, by chance, discovers the jewels, and naturally believes Heath is a robber. She realizes that Marcia must have hidden them, and decides to say nothing, putting the gems back in their hiding place.

Prince came bounding into the house from some distant pilgrimage of his own, almost knocking her down in his eagerness for breakfast.

She glanced far up the shore and saw, serenely rocking with the tide, "My Unknown Lady."

As she whispered the name, she was conscious of hot blood rushing to her cheeks.

How ridiculous! Stanley Heath was simply a stranger of a night, he was nothing to her.

Well indeed was it, too, that he was not!

During her hours of sleeplessness the ardor of her faith in him had, to a degree, cooled. True, she still maintained her belief in his innocence; but that belief, she now realized, was only a blind unfounded intuition. Both the circumstances and sober second thought failed to back it up. The man's impatience to be gone, his complete silence with regard to the jewels, although perfectly justifiable, did not strengthen it.

Marcia conceded he had every right to keep his affairs to himself. Had he started to confide his secret to her, she would have held up her hand to stay him.

It was the fact that through the dim hours of the night, while she sat at his elbow trying to make the discomforts he suffered more bearable, he talked of almost everything else but the thing uppermost in both their minds. That was what hurt. She did not want to know. She wanted to be trusted; to help; to feel his dependence upon her. Instead he held her at arm's length.

He spoke with appreciation of the crew who had dragged his boat off the sand-bar, appearing to consider them tremendously kind—as undoubtedly they were! Still, they had not begun to come into the close contact with him that she had.

Marcia caught herself up with a round turn. Here she was being sensitive, womanish. How detestable! Why should Stanley Heath pour out his soul to her? She had never laid eyes on him until yesterday. In a day or two he would be gone never again to come into her life. She was glad of it. It was better so.

This decision reached, she drew in her chin, lifted her head a wee bit and began to get the breakfast.

Even Doctor Stetson's arrival and his subsequent verdict that the patient had bronchitis and would take his life in his hands should he leave his bed, afforded her only scant satisfaction.

So she was to keep Stanley Heath under her roof after all—but against his will. It was not a very flattering situation.

She sent Sylvia up with his coffee and toast, and began her usual round of morning duties.

And then just as they were finished and the clock was striking eleven, he called.

She went up, cheerful but with her head still held high, and paused on the threshold.

Glancing at her he smiled.

"You look like a bird about to take flight. Won't you sit down?"

She went nearer. Nevertheless she did not take the chair he indicated.

"I see you are busy," he said. "I thought perhaps your housework might be done by this time and you might have a moment to spare. Well, I mustn't interrupt. Forgive me for calling."

"I haven't a thing in the world to do," Marcia burst out.

"Good! Then you can stay a little while," he coaxed. "Now answer this question truthfully, please. You heard what Doctor Stetson said about my returning to New York today. I don't want to be pig-headed and take a risk if it is imprudent; that is neither fair to others nor to myself. Still, it is important that I go and I am anxious to. What is your advice?"

"I think you are too ill."

A frown of annoyance wrinkled his forehead.

"Perhaps you're right. Yet for all that I am disappointed. I want very much to go. It is necessary."

"Such as—"

"Letters, telegrams—whatever you wish. I can telephone or telegraph anywhere. Or I can write."

Surprise stole over his face, then deepened to admiration.

"You would do that for me—blindfolded?"

"Why not? I simply want to help. I always like to help when I can."

"Even when you do not understand?"

Piercingly his eyes rested on her face.

"I—I—do not need to understand," was her proud retort.

For the fraction of a second their glances met. When he spoke his voice was low—imperative.

"Marcia—come here!"

She went—she knew not why.

"Give me your hand."

Again, half-trembling, half reluctant, she obeyed.

He took it in his and bending, kissed it.

"I will stay and you shall telegraph," was all he said.

She sprang to fetch paper and pencil, as if welcoming this break in the tension.

"I'm afraid I cannot write plainly enough with my left hand," he said. "Will you take down the message?"

"Certainly."

"Mrs. S. C. Heath."

Her pencil, so firm only an instant before, quivered.

"Have you that?"

"Yes."

"The Biltmore, New York City."

"Yes."

"Everything safe with me. Do not worry. Marooned on Cape Cod with cold. Nothing serious. Home soon. Love. Stanley."

"Got that?"

"Yes."

Had something gone out of her voice? The monosyllable was flat, colorless. Heath looked at her. Even her expression was different—or did he merely imagine it?

"Perhaps I would better just glance over the message before you send it—simply to make sure it's right."

"Let me copy it first," she objected.

"Copy it? Nonsense! What for? Nobody's going to see it."

He reached for the paper.

Still she withheld it.

"What's the trouble?"

"It isn't written well enough. I'd rather copy it."

"Why?"

"It's wobbly. I—I—perhaps my hands were cold."

"You're not chilly?"

"No—oh, no."

"If the room is cool you mustn't stay here."

"It isn't. I'm not cold at all."

"Will you let me take the telegram?"

She placed it in his hand.

"It is shaky. However, that's of no consequence, since you are to 'phone Western Union. Now, if you truly are not cold, I'd like to dictate a second wire."

"All right."

"This one is for Currier," he said. "Mr. James Currier, The Biltmore, New York City. Safe on Cape with My Lady. Shall return with her later. Motor here at once, bringing whatever I need for indefinite stay.

"Stanley C. Heath."

"Got that?"

"O. K.," nodded Marcia.

This time, without hesitation, she passed him the paper.

"This, I see, is your normal handwriting," he commented as he placed the messages side by side.

Taking up the sheets, he studied them with interest.

"Hadn't I better go and get off the messages?" suggested Marcia, rising nervously. "The station might be closed. Often it is, at noontime."

"It doesn't matter if they don't go until afternoon."

"But there might be some slip."

He glanced at her with his keen eyes.

"What's the matter?"

"Matter?"

"Yes, with you? All of a sudden you've turned easterly."

"Have I?" Lightly, she laughed. "I probably have caught the habit from the sea. Environment does influence character, psychologists say."

"Nevertheless, you are not fickle."

"How do you know? You know an amazing amount about me, seems to me, considering the length of our acquaintance," she observed with a tantalizing smile.

"I do," was the grim retort. "I know more than you think—more, perhaps than you know yourself. Shall I hold the betraying mirror up before you?"

"The mirror of truth? God forbid! Who of us would dare face it?" she protested, still smiling but with genuine alarm. "Now do let me run along and send off the messages. I must not loiter here talking. You are forgetting that you're ill. The next you know your temperature will go up and Doctor Stetson will blame me."

"My temperature has gone up," growled Stanley Heath, turning his back on her and burying his face in the pillow with the touchiness of a small boy.

Sylvia, meanwhile, had heard Stanley Heath call Marcia and hailed her aunt's departure from the kitchen as the opportunity for which she had so anxiously been waiting.

No sooner was the elder woman upstairs and out of earshot than she tiptoed from her room, the monogrammed handkerchief in her pocket.

She had pried out the brick and had the jewel-case in her hand, wrapped and ready for its return when conversation overhead suddenly ceased and she heard Marcia pass through the hall and start down stairs.

Sylvia gasped. There was no chance to put the package back and replace the brick, which fitted so tightly that its adjustment was a process requiring patience, care, and time.

Flustered, frightened, she jammed the jewel case into her dress and frantically restoring the brick to the yawning hole in the hearth as best she could, she fled up the back stairs at the same moment Marcia descended the front ones.

Once in her room, she closed and locked the door and sank panting into a chair to recover her breath.

Well, at least she had not been caught and in the meantime the jewels were quite safe.

She took the case stealthily from her pocket. Now that the gems were in her possession, it certainly could do no harm for her to look at them—even try them on, as she had been tempted to do when she first discovered them. Probably never again in all her life would she hold in her hand so much wealth and beauty.

Accordingly she unwound the handkerchief and opened the box.

There lay the glistening heap of treasure, resplendent in the sunshine, a far more gorgeous spectacle than she had realized.

Going to the bureau, Sylvia took out the jewels, one by one.

She clasped the diamonds about her neck; fastened the emerald brooch in place; put on the sapphire pendant; then added the rings and looked at herself in the gold-framed mirror.

What she saw reflected dazzled her. Who would have believed jewels could make such a difference in one's appearance? They set off her blond beauty so that she was suddenly transformed into a princess.

Slowly, and with conscious coquetry, like a preening bird, she turned her head this way and that, delighting in the creaminess of the neck the gems encircled, and in the fairness of her golden curls.

She really ought to have jewels. She was born for them and could carry them off. There were myriad women in the world on whom such adornment would be wasted—good and worthy women, too.

Then a voice interrupted her reverie.

It was Stanley Heath calling.

She heard Marcia reply and come hurrying upstairs.

Guiltily Sylvia took off her sparkling regalia; tumbled it unceremoniously into its case; and slipped it into the drawer underneath a pile of nightdresses. Then she softly unlocked the door and sauntered out.

It was none too soon, for Marcia was speaking to her.

"Sylvia?"

"Yes."

"How would you feel about going over to the village for the mail and to do some errands? The tide is out and you could walk. Prince needs a run."

"I'd love to go."

"That's fine. Here is a list of things we need at the store. You're sure you don't mind going?"

"No, indeed. I shall enjoy being out."

Then suddenly Sylvia had an inspiration which she instantly acted upon.

"Why don't you go?" she inquired. "You didn't sleep much last night, and a walk might do you good."

"Oh, I couldn't," objected Marcia with haste. "I've a hundred and one things to do. Thanks, just the same."

"Well, you know your own business best. Is this the list?"

"Yes. There are quite a few items, but they won't be heavy. Here is the basket. Prince will carry it. That is his job and very proud he is of doing it. Good-by, dear."

"She's dreadfully anxious to get us out of the way, isn't she, Prince?" commented young Sylvia as she and the setter started out over the sand. "Now what do you suppose she has on her mind? She's up to something. Marcia isn't a bit of an actress. She's too genuine."

Marcia, standing at the window watching the girl, would have been astonished enough had she heard this astute observation.

She did want Sylvia out of the way. The girl had read her correctly.

She must telephone the messages to the stationmaster at Sawyer Falls, the adjoining town where the railroad ended and the nearest telegraph station was.

She got the line and had no sooner dictated the telegrams than she heard Heath's voice.

During the interval that had elapsed since she had left him, both of them had experienced a reaction and each was eager to make amends.

Marcia regretted her flippancy. It had been childish of her to give way to pique and punish Heath simply because it was proved he had a wife. Why should he not be married? No doubt the absent Mrs. Stanley Heath was a dashing, sophisticated beauty, too, who lived in luxury at the great city hotel to which the first wire had been sent.

Heath had been quite frank about the message and its destination. On thinking matters over, it occurred to Marcia he might have considered this the easiest way to inform her of things he found it embarrassing to put into words.

And she?

Instead of appreciating his honesty, chivalry, gentlemanly conduct as she should have done, and receiving it graciously, surprise had betrayed her into displaying resentment.

She was heartily ashamed of herself. No matter how much it humbled her pride, she must put things right. Fortunately it was not too late to do so.

WASHINGTON DIGEST

National Topics Interpreted

BY WILLIAM BRUCKART

NATIONAL PRESS BLDG. WASHINGTON, D.C.

Confusion Is the Word

Washington.—The dictionary says the word confusion means mixed indiscriminately; disordered, deranged; perplexed; bewildered, or disconcerted.

There probably is no better word to describe the situation in Washington over the past three weeks than the word confusion. If one keeps an eye half open, one cannot help seeing all of the things mentioned in the dictionary definition of the word. There might be an addition. If I were to expand the definition and make it just a little more applicable to the circumstances in the national Capital, I would add "running around in circles."

The reconvening of congress always is a signal for commotion, and confusion and taut nerves. The opening sessions, nevertheless, usually have been mild for a few days. The climax was reached by a gradual building up of excitement to the moment of the annual message of the President on the state of the Union. This time, however, the climax came quickly and instead of a subsidence, as we usually have seen, the crest of the wave of excitement continued. If this is a barometric prediction of what we may see in the forthcoming political campaign, there will be, indeed, a battle.

That the picture of Washington confusion may be pieced together, let us review in briefest form some of the things that happened:

Congress reconvenes at noon on a Friday—orders go from the White House to the Capitol that the President desires to deliver his annual speech on the state of the Union immediately—arrangements are made promptly for a night session (the second of its kind in history)—President Roosevelt delivers a masterful discourse on international affairs, virtually naming names of autocratic rulers throughout the world and demanding that they cease arbitrary programs leading to war, and follows that with a plain political speech regarding domestic affairs, challenging New Deal opponents to undo what the New Deal administration had done—Republican National Chairman Fletcher bitingly attacks the political phases of the Roosevelt speech on the state of the Union and demands that radio broadcasting companies give New Deal opponents the same time and the same stations for broadcasting a political answer—broadcasting company replies show a desire to be fair with radio time and toss back to Mr. Fletcher the difficult task of selecting individuals to answer Mr. Roosevelt.

• • •

Rail at Supreme Court

The Supreme court in a momentous decision invalidates the Agricultural Adjustment act, key measure of New Deal reform—Mr. Roosevelt declines comment on this decision but New Deal spokesmen otherwise settle down around the ears of the nine justices with vitriolic comment—New Deal critics of the court and the institution move swiftly to revise the Constitution to fit New Deal theories and to curb the power of the judiciary, preventing it from interfering in their determination to remake America—Agriculture Secretary Wallace and Agricultural Administrator Davis call farm leaders to consider ways and means for reviving or superseding the "gentle rain of checks" that was AAA—the annual budget of estimates for expenditures from July 1, 1936, to June 30, 1937, carrying $6,752,606,000, is sent to congress—relief appropriations are omitted; result, no one can tell yet how large the next year's expenditures will be—house and senate agriculture leaders scurry hither and yon, hold conferences, discuss political repercussions from the invalidation of AAA and get nowhere very rapidly.

At $50 Per Plate

Wheelhorses of the Democratic party rush through plans for and hold the annual Jackson day dinner on the anniversary of the battle of New Orleans. Word leaks out that Postmaster General Farley, who is also chairman of the Democratic National committee and chairman of the New York State Democratic committee, has fixed a price of fifty dollars per plate to those joining in the No. 1 Jackson day dinner at which the President spoke—the American Liberty league charges Mr. Farley with violating the corrupt practices act which says in effect that no government official may solicit or cause to be solicited funds from government jobholders—the answer of the Democratic National committee is that Mr. Farley has no part in ticket sales—Liberty league officials cite the committee's own press statement quoting Mr. Farley's conversation with 48 state presidents of Young Democrat clubs that they should charge enough per plate to help defray the deficit of the Democratic National committee besides the cost of their dinners in the various sections of the country—Democratic National committee meets and selects Philadelphia as the site of the Democratic National convention, fixing June 23 as the date after Philadelphia, with a certified check of $200,000, outbids all others to be host—Republican Chairman Fletcher issues denial that the Republican National committee had anything to do with the use of stamp stickers ridiculing the New Deal.

Lobbyists for the ex-service men reach an agreement on the type of legislation for immediate cash payment of the bonus and the legislation passes the house—Senator Nye and his publicity seeking Senate Munitions Investigating committee take the partners of the house of Morgan over the grill in an attempt to show that this great financial institution led the United States into the World war—Morgan's answer links officials of President Wilson's administration with the development of sentiment favorable to American participation on the side of the Allies—Senator Nye gains much publicity for himself and the neutrality bill which he sponsors in the senate—many new representatives of business arrive in Washington, open offices, prepare to fight against further New Deal encroachment upon private business, and everyone runs around in circles.

Looks Like Rough Battle

At the outset of this discussion, I suggested that if events of the last several weeks form a proper criterion, the political campaign that is now under way is going to be rough. I base that prediction upon the view taken of it by Postmaster General Farley, the king-pin Democratic politician and the reactions that have come editorially and in news columns to the President's Jackson day dinner speech and the political phases of his message on the state of the Union. Mr. Farley made no bones about the prospect. He foresees all kinds of mud slinging, misrepresentation and personal attacks.

Aside from his statesmanlike discussion of international problems, Mr. Roosevelt's message to congress descended to the point where he was definitely cataloging all opposition to the New Deal as "greedy and selfish" men and women. Every one of them, in the President's opinion, has a personal ax of avarice to grind. He intends, apparently, to make that his theme song.

Whether his conclusions are right or wrong is not in question here. The point is that since Mr. Roosevelt has opened the fire in that manner, he can naturally expect the same type of fire to be returned. In the language of the twelve-year-old ruffian: "He asked for it." There was another striking thing about the Roosevelt speeches to congress and to the Jackson day diners. For the first time since he has occupied the White House, he gave every evidence of being nettled and nervous. He spoke in a voice that appeared to be tired; there was lacking that buoyancy, that smile, when he spoke that used to characterize his expressions. You will recall undoubtedly that for a long time in the early part of his administration he was wholly unmindful of his enemies, ignored them completely, and plowed straight ahead with a determination that won him many friends. Lately, however, there has been unmistakable evidence of a martyr complex in his manner.

• • •

Laying His Lines

Referring again to the two speeches, I have heard any number of observers comment, first, on his almost tearful appeal at the conclusion of his speech to congress, and secondly, to his thinly veiled comparison between himself and President Jackson when he spoke to the Jackson day diners.

I am not making any predictions as to where this trend will lead. It is important to note, however, that it is an old political trick to impugn the motives of the opposition. Such was the mood into which former President Herbert Hoover fell when in 1931 it became apparent his political life was on the skids and slipping fast. When he was "on his way out" Mr. Hoover became so picayunish that even his own associates found it difficult to do the things he wanted done in the way he desired. This condition continued to develop until he began to complain personally about the "hair shirts" that he had to wear. The "hair shirts" incident probably was the best tip-off to the sinking feeling that had begun to permeate Mr. Hoover's outlook at that time. The rest is history.

As to the course which Mr. Roosevelt is following in impugning the motives of his opposition, one can hardly take objection because it has been done so often and for the further reason that neither Mr. Roosevelt nor Mr. Farley is a political novice. I believe that Washington observers generally give each of these men credit for being thoroughly versed in politics and since Mr. Roosevelt is "dimly conscious that a campaign is under way and an election is scheduled," he naturally is laying his lines. They will be pulled from time to time with a resultant display for public view intended to convince the person of small means or no means at all that he is their savior; that he intends and seeks at all times to protect them from those selfish and greedy groups who seek to grind down the population for the sake of profit.

With the Minnesota Lawmakers

With each house of the Minnesota legislature standing pat on its own particular version of the old age pension plan, a thorn was projected into the previously smooth progress of the special session. To a conference committee, composed of five members from each body, the bill was handed for redrafting and agreement.

Comprising the conference committee were: Senators H. C. Stiening of Moorhead, K. G. Neumeier of Stillwater, A. J. Rockne of Zumbrota, O. J. Finstad of Windom, and B. G. Novak of St. Paul; and Representatives Andrew Finstuen of Kenyon, R. G. Johnson of Forest Lake, L. M. Hall of St. Cloud, George MacKinnon of Minneapolis, and Warren E. Hastings of Two Harbors.

Necessity for such action arose when the senate repassed its own bill after the house had sent over its version of the measure. When the house received the senate bill again, it promptly voted rejection, and called for a conference committee.

Principal differences to be settled concern the senate proposal to have counties pay one-fourth of the total pensions within their boundaries while the house proposed one-eighth, the degree of responsibility to which children of pensioners shall be held, and the amount of property that pensioners may own. Also is the date for putting the pensions into effect.

Turning its attention to other major problems, the house passed the unemployment insurance fund bill, which the senate had previously killed. The upper body is prevented by parliamentary law from considering the subject again at this session, but it was indicated that a resolution would be adopted calling for an interim study for preparation of a new insurance bill for the 1937 session.

An appropriation of $1,800,000 for the financing of the pension plan was also voted by the house. The senate passed the house measure permitting owners of tax delinquent property to pay off in installments, but amended it to exclude 1934 levies. At the same time, a joint committee prepared a special bill designed to furnish relief authorities with approximately $14,000,000 for distribution to the needy up to July 1, 1937.

In the face of opposition from Hennepin county and Minneapolis school officials, legislative tax reformists hoped to get favorable action in the senate tax committee consideration of the measure to permit owners of tax delinquent property to pay off their indebtedness in installments. The bill, already passed by the house, is designed to bring $85,000,000 in delinquent taxes into the state treasury. Hennepin county officials objected to the bill on the grounds that it would supersede the 1933 law permitting tax delinquents of 1926 and since to pay off on a 50 per cent basis.

Among other objections to the bill was that expressed by Lynn Thompson, member of the Minneapolis school board, who criticized the provision that all returns from the new law be used to pay off existing indebtedness. Such a plan, he said, would prevent the educational system from obtaining $600,000 a year which it now receives from payment of back taxes, which now are divided among the various governmental departments.

Measures designed to finance the pension bill, in the meantime, found their way into the house chambers. Rep. Warren Hastings, Two Harbors, suggested authorizing the state highway department to issue $3,500,000 in bonds, of which amount, $1,800,000 is to be paid to Minnesota's general revenue fund. This measure received immediate committee approval.

The sum is owed the revenue fund by the highway department for the cost of issuing automobile licenses in former years. Instead of permitting the department to repay the money over a period of six years, the legislature decided to obtain it at once, making another direct appropriation for the pension fund.

The committee placed its stamp of approval, also, on an appropriation of $35,000 for repairs and remodeling of the house chambers. Another bill recommended provides for appointment of an interim commission of three house members and two senators to study and recodify the state's criminal code. A $4,000 appropriation is necessary to carry on the recodifying work.

A $5,000 fund to finance the attorney general's prosecution in the murder case of Walter Liggett, slain Minneapolis publisher, was given final legislative approval by the house after it had received a bill providing for a 10 man commission to investigate crime and lawlessness in the Mill City. The bill previously had been put into law by the house, but returned from the senate chambers with an amendment stating that the $5,000 should be taken from the attorney general's contingent fund for next year.

what Irvin S. Cobb thinks about:

Seeds of Lawlessness.

WESTWOOD, CALIF.—For our lawlessness we're forever blaming hot-headedness, the innate high temper of the races behind us. But did you ever notice this? Members of those identical breeds somehow manage to control their homicidal impulses better in countries where cold-blooded murder means the rope within four weeks, as in Canada; manage to be more honest in countries where deliberated felony means a full term at hard labor, as in Great Britain; or where the run of crimes means stern confinement in real prisons, as in various Scandinavian and Teutonic countries. And did it ever occur to you that the proverbial mush-headed sentimentality of American juries—and overly sympathetic judges and delayed trials, and prolonged appeals and reversals on trivial technicalities, and postponement of punishment through legal devices; and publicity-seeking governors, and crooked lawyers in cahoots with known criminals; and perjury-mills, and wardens who think penitentiaries should be playhouses for coddling naughty boys and girls; and most of all, the prospect of quick release for chronic offenders, regardless of what outraged prosecutors or thwarted police authorities may think about it—might have some bearing also? Before we diagnose the fruitage, let's analyze the seeds.

Paroles and the Death Penalty.

SOMETHING I said here the other day brings an impassioned telegram from a gentleman who demands to know how I stand on the summary releasing of prison inmates, and my position on the infliction of the death penalty.

Well, nobody except the party in question may be deeply interested in my opinions, still this seems as good a place as any to answer him. Since any convicted criminal has the right to appeal from the verdict against him, I'd like to see a law in every state giving the citizens in the community where he was tried the right to appeal from the act of any parole board in turning the said criminal loose again.

And I'm sure more of us would be against capital punishment if only we had reasonable assurance of some punishment for murderers, kidnapers and degenerate beasts who attack women and children.

I forgot to say the message came "collect." So I judge the gentleman is not only curious, but frugal.

The New Champion Bride.

BEFORE she seemed to despair of ever getting a start on husbands again and sort of slowed up, I used to think Peggy Hopkins Et Cetera Joyce had the best claim to the title, "The Bride of Her Country." But a new champion has arisen.

So rally around, you earnest Hollywood contenders for the All-American Matrimonial sweepstakes, and salute your queen. She's Mrs. Virginia Overshiner Patterson Stark Seeger Gilbert Kahn Cogeswell Gould-Porter, who has just been coaxed to the altar for the eighth time in that many years. And she still but a mere chit of a girl.

If ever that record-busting lady holds a family reunion, won't there be a crowd! And, if she keeps on marrying around, to and fro, the day is coming when the rest of her name will have to run as a second section.

I wonder how it happened she never met any of the Mdivani boys?

The Santa Anita Races.

I'M HOPING those American archeologists who are digging into ancient Troy find Ulysses' famous wooden horse. It would help me to confirm a theory that a wooden horse must have been the original model for some of the entries I've been betting on at Santa Anita track.

I recall one reluctant nag whose name escapes me, but it certainly should have been Bide-A-Wee, out of Virginia Creeper by Stationary Engine.

Everybody here goes out there. Some of the actors own race horses or some of the race horses own actors, I'm not sure which. And you see all the studio playwrights pranking about. I'm pranking about. Well, it's a great place to write plays—a race track is. I quit going after the first few days. It made me so late for dinner at night—waiting for my horse to come in.

Midgets in the House.

YOU remember what happened the time before this when J. P. Morgan appeared at Washington to tell a senatorial investigating committee how patriotism might be combined with profits in such a way as not seriously to damage either? A sideshow dwarf came and nestled in his lap.

If, on the present visit, Mr. Morgan craves a repetition of that gladsome incident, I can think of fifty members of the house, not to mention many office-holders, any one of whom could play that Lilliputian's role and nobody would notice the difference. Both midgets and congressmen seem to be running to the smaller sizes these times.

Safetygrams BY FRED W. BRAUN The Safety Man

Another year has gone by. The statistics for the 1935 driving history are not yet complete or available, but I make the prediction that there will be very little improvement over 1934. Some states have shown a reduction in fatalities but others have shown an increase.

By combined cooperation of public officials and the people themselves, all states could show a reduction in fatalities and a reduction in automobile accidents.

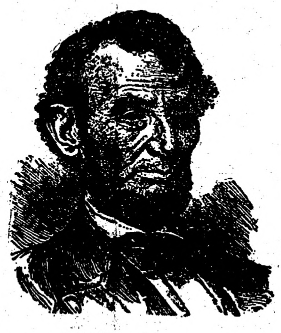
Why are the people of the United States so indifferent to this problem? Public opinion is much more favorable toward accident prevention than it was five years ago but there should be considerably more. Public opinion will dictate policies of enforcement and public opinion will support them.

I urge that all people and all societies interest themselves in the state, county or local safety organization for the promotion of safety on our highways.

Card of Thanks

I hereby express my thanks to all my friends who came to see me while I was at the hospital, especially those who donated the blood for my transfusions, those who gave the beautiful flowers and plants and those who so kindly assisted with the work at the newspaper office.

H. O. Hanson.



In view of recent Supreme Court decisions, Abe Lincoln's opinion of that august body, delivered on the occasion of the Dred Scott Decision, is peculiarly appropriate today. He said:

"The Supreme Court has got the doctrine of popular sovereignty down as thin as homeopathic soup that was made by boiling the shadow of a pigeon that had starved to death."

1935 Business Showed Improvement Over '34

Business was much better in 1935 than in 1934—but did profits follow the trend? Answer to that depends on what business you are interested in.

A Business Week tabulation shows that some industries made remarkable profit records, measured by the dividends they paid. Steel dividends rose 100 per cent; mail order houses, 165 per cent; coppers, 148 per cent. Only two industries showed drops: tobaccos and railroad equipment, which went back 3 per cent and 40 per cent respectively.

Utilities' dividends rose 1 per cent; banks and insurance, 7 per cent; railroads, 3 per cent; foods 2 per cent; chain stores, 1 per cent; motors, 42 per cent; oils, 8 per cent. Average increase in industrial dividends was 10 per cent.

Deer Experiments Begun at Itasca

If you are lucky enough to get your deer next fall you may find a metal tag attached to one of the animal's ear. If so, the division of game and fish asks you to notify them at once, giving the place and time of taking.

Thirty Itasca Park deer were trapped last week and released after the metal ear tags had been attached. Gustav Swanson, biologist in charge of the work, said that the tagging would result in valuable information as to the annual movements of deer from breeding to feeding grounds.

The deer trapped last week were first examined by C. P. Fitch, R. Fenstermacher and D. Hatfield of the University of Minnesota to make sure that they were free from dangerous diseases. Later on the tagged deer will be taken out of Itasca Park, Mr. Swanson said.

No difficulty was experienced in trapping the deer. Several of them were caught three or four times in the same traps.

NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING BUILDS INDUSTRY

A fine testimonial to the increasing value of newspaper advertising as a producer of business and industrial development was given in a recent public statement by L. A. Warren, President of Safeway Stores, Inc., a chain grocery system serving western America.

Citing his own company as a barometer indicative of the attitude of business in general toward advertising, Mr. Warren declared that he considered the growth of Safeway Stores and similar systems but a reflection of the power of newspapers to build and maintain public respect and public patronage. He added: "It is through advertising that people come to know and to understand the scope of any business concern's public service, and the commodities it offers for public consumption.

"It seems only natural that those concerns using newspaper advertising, uninterrupted year after year, do retain the highest confidence of the public that they serve. Their customers have found out that they can truthfully rely upon the advertised product, service and economy which so often feature the display advertising of the chain stores.

"We have repeatedly endeavored to help farmers dispose of surplus of distressed crops by conducting widespread advertising campaigns on certain products at various seasons of the year. These campaigns have been eminently successful, and their beneficial effects to agriculture are both a tribute to newspaper advertising and the advantages of chain-store distribution."

Any kind of merchandiser, chain or independent, will doubtless reflect Mr. Warren's views. Newspaper advertising is not only the best way to get business for a good product or service—it is also the best way to hold it.

WILD DUCKS PICK COLDEST SPOT IN U. S. FOR WINTER

International Falls— Apparently a flock of five ducks, of the bluebill variety, cannot read the current weather reports, and are making their home in the Rainy river this winter. Altho International Falls has been set down in reports as being the coldest spot in the United States, with temperatures running as low as 54 degrees below zero, this group of bluebills may not subscribe to the papers and are not keeping up with the news. The birds, whenever a part of Rainy lake opens up, as it frequently does during the winter, will fly up to the larger open water, during cold snaps returning to the river just above the dam, which never freezes over. Just why these ducks choose Rainy river and Rainy lake as a winter resort has never been satisfactorily explained, but it is a fact that some of the birds spend each winter here. As one editor remarked, "With a pair of wings and a good squawk, we wouldn't be hanging around these prairies this time of the year!"

Farmers Union Is Active at Capitol

The Northwest Farmers Union Legislative Committee was included in the group of Farm leaders called to Washington by Henry Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, to discuss and formulate a farm program to take the place of the Triple A which was invalidated by the Supreme Court.

Members of the committee are C. C. Talbott, Jamestown, N. D.; Dan O'Connor, New Rockford, N. D.; C. W. Fine, Sheyenne, N. D.; Leo Dobeny, Brady, Montana; Kenneth Hones, Colfax, Wisconsin; and J. Edward Anderson, Buffalo, Minnesota. The committee plans to retain representation in Washington as directed by the stockholders of the Farmers Union business activities as long as there is need for such representation. The legislative program is the one adopted by the stockholders of the Farmers Union business activities at the convention held last December. A weekly news release of the work of the committee will be issued and sent to the newspapers.

The first action of the committee was to offer whole-hearted cooperation with the other farm groups called in by the Secretary of Agriculture. The representatives of these farm groups organized themselves by selecting Mr. Wm. Settle of Indiana as chairman. A rules committee was named and C. C. Talbott represented the Farmers Union on this committee.

After considerable discussion a committee of 13 was selected to draw a report. Mr. E. E. Kennedy represented the Farmers Union on this committee. After one day's session the committee of 13 brought out a unanimous report embodied in seven points. By unanimous action the entire conference adopted the report of the committee of 13.

Mr. E. H. Everson summoned the State Presidents of the Farmers Educational and Co-Operative Union of America to come to Washington. Sixteen state presidents responded to the call. These states presidents together with the National officers made a study of the seven point program. Having done this they too unanimously endorsed and adopted the report of the committee of 13, directing the national officers, Messrs. Everson and Kennedy to represent the Farmers Union in the National Agriculture Conference. Thus all of agriculture is now united in a great organization and program designed to lift the tillers of the soil to their rightful place.

While in Washington the Northwest Farmers Union Legislative Committee will maintain headquarters at the Burlington Hotel.

Going Out of Ourselves to Refresh Our Thoughts

Doctor Richardson tells us there is nothing so wholesome for an active mind as to secure rest by variety of work. A man can do five or six times more than he expects if he varies his work. I have found that to be so in my own life. By varying his work a man obtains fresh spirits, and renewed powers for the duties of daily life.

There is so much that is discouraging and depressing in the world, that we must sometimes go forth, as it were, out of ourselves for fresh thoughts and fresh air. The greatest workers, when they go out for a holiday, are not idle; they find rest by change of occupation. Life is too short to admit of idleness in anybody.—Erskine Clarke.

Illiterate Persons in U. S. Number More Than 4,000,000

Illiteracy is commonly understood to mean the inability of adults to read, write, or both. In some countries the basis of the calculation is the number of men and women married who cannot sign the register; in others the ability of army recruits to read; there is therefore no trustworthy method of making comparisons between different countries on this question. In the United States, a person is technically called illiterate by the census bureau if over ten years of age and unable to read and write.

Recent figures for the United States are those for the 1930 census. At that time the total number of illiterates in a population of 98,723,047 ten years of age or over, was 4,283,753. Of the total the native white illiterates numbered 1,103,134, foreign born, 1,304,084 and negroes 1,513,892.

BEFORE you take any preparation you don't know all about, for the relief of headaches; or the pains of rheumatism, neuritis or neuralgia, ask your doctor what he thinks about it—in comparison with Genuine Bayer Aspirin.

We say this because, before the discovery of Bayer Aspirin, most so-called "pain" remedies were advised against by physicians as being bad for the stomach; or, often, for the heart. And the discovery of Bayer Aspirin largely changed medical practice.

Countless thousands of people who have taken Bayer Aspirin year in and out without ill effect, have proved that the medical findings about its safety were correct.

Remember this: Genuine Bayer Aspirin is rated among the fastest methods yet discovered for the relief of headaches and all common pains . . . and safe for the average person to take regularly.

You can get real Bayer Aspirin at any drug store—simply by never asking for it by the name "aspirin" alone, but always saying BAYER ASPIRIN when you buy.

SYNOPSIS

The future of the still youthful and comely "Widder" Marcia Howe, recently released by death from her idling husband, is a conversational tit-bit among housewives of the little hamlet of Wilton. Eligible bachelors and widowers also are interested. Marcia is lonely, and has invited her late husband's niece, Sylvia Hayden, whom she has never seen, to visit her. A stranger, on the verge of exhaustion, finds his way to Marcia's home. Secretly, he asks Marcia to hide a package containing jewelry. She does so. Elisha Winslow, town sheriff, brings news of a jewel robbery nearby. The stranger gives his name as Stanley Heath. Sylvia, by chance, discovers the jewels, and naturally believes Heath is a robber. She realizes that Marcia must have hidden them, and decides to say nothing, putting the gems back in their hiding place. Marcia admits to herself that she has altogether too deep an interest in her guest, but is powerless to overcome it. Heath has wired "Mrs. S. C. Heath," New York, saying he is safe. He also orders a man named Currier to come at once. Sylvia, in her room, bedecks herself with the jewels. At Marcia's approach she hides them there.

Therefore, a very different Marcia Howe responded to Stanley Heath's summons.

She was now all gentleness, friendliness, and shyly penitent.

Stanley, again master of himself, welcomed her with amazement. Could man ever fathom a woman's moods, he asked himself? Why this chastened and distractingly adorable Marcia?

Well, if he could not fathom her, he at least was grateful for her understanding.

Nevertheless he did mentally observe he had not dreamed her to be so many-sided or credited her with a tithe the fascinations he had so unexpectedly discovered her to possess.

"Here I am, Mr. Heath. What can I do for you?" was her greeting.

This time she did not hesitate, but went directly to the chair beside his bed and sat down. He smiled and, meeting his eyes, she smiled back. This was better. Heath sighed a sigh of relief.

"I've been thinking, since you went down stairs, about Currier. He ought to arrive late tonight or early tomorrow morning. He will start the moment he gets my wire. Although he will not know in which house I am quartered, he will have the wit to inquire, for he has more than the ordinary quota of brains. I don't know what I should do without him. I shall have him leave the car in the village and after he has delivered over the clothing he is to bring, he can take the noon train back to New York, carrying the jewels with him."

"I see," nodded Marcia.

She did not see. Nevertheless she heartily welcomed the intelligence that the jewels with their damning evidence, if evidence it was, were to be removed from the house. The sooner they were out of the way the better. If they were not damning evidence they at least were a great responsibility.

Suppose something were to happen to them? Suppose somebody suspected they were in the house?

"So," continued Stanley Heath, "I think sometime today when you have a good opportunity you'd better get the case and bring it up here. I shall then have it here in my room and I can hand it over to Currier without any trouble."

"I'll go fetch it now. Sylvia has gone to the village and this is a splendid chance," cried Marcia.

"Fine!"

"I'll be right back."

He heard her speed down the stairs and listened to her step in the room below.

Then there was silence.

A few moments later she came racing back, white and breathless.

"They're gone!" she cried. "The place is empty! The jewels are not there!"

Her terror and the fear lest her pallor foreshadowed collapse produced in Heath that artificial calm one sometimes sees when a strong nature reins itself in and calls upon its reserve control.

The man thought only of how to quiet her. Reaching out, he touched her hair.

"Hush, Marcia. The jewels will be found. Don't give way like this. I cannot bear to see you. The whole lot of them are not worth your tears."

"But you left them in my care. It was I who suggested where to hide them," she moaned.

"I know. And it was a splendid idea, too. I could not let that sheriff of yours peel off my clothes and find the diamonds on me. He isn't a man of sufficient imagination—or perhaps he is one of far too much. I am not blaming you—not in the least. We did the best we could in the emergency. If things have gone wrong, it is no fault of yours."

"But you trusted me. I ought to have watched. I should not have left the kitchen day or night," declared Marcia, lifting her tear-stained face to his.

"You have been there most of the time, haven't you?"

"I went to see them get the boat off yesterday."

"Still, some one was here. Sylvia was in the house."

"Yes, but she knew nothing about the jewels and therefore may not have realized the importance of staying on deck. All I asked her to do was to remain within call. She may have gone upstairs, or into another room."

"When she comes back, you can ask her. Now we must pull ourselves together, dear," went on Stanley gently. "It is important that we do not give ourselves away. Sylvia may know nothing and if she does not, we must not let her suspect."

She rose but he still held her hand, a common misery routing every thought of conventionality.

The firmness and magnetism of his touch brought strength. It was a new experience, for during her life with Jason, Marcia had been the oak—the one who consoled, sustained. For a few delicious moments, she let herself rest, weary and unresisting, within the shelter of Stanley Heath's grasp. Then she drew away and, passing her hand across her forehead as if awaking from a dream, murmured:

"I'd better go down. Sylvia will be coming."

"Very well. Now keep a stiff upper lip."

"I will—I'll do my best."

Even as she spoke the outer door opened, then closed with a bang.

"There's Sylvia now. I must go."

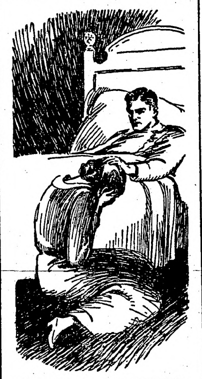
"I'm awfully sorry I banged the door," she apologized. "A gust of wind took it. I do hope I didn't wake up Mr. Heath. Here's the marketing. And Marcia, what do you suppose? I had a letter from Hortie Fuller—that fellow back home that I've told you about. He's sent me a five-pound box of candy and he wants to come to Wilton and spend his summer vacation."



"Hush, Marcia. The Jewels Will Be Found."

The girl's eyes were shining and she breathed quickly.

"Of course I don't care a button for Hortie. Still, it would be rather good fun to see him. It seems ages since I've laid eyes on him. You know how it is—you get used to a person who is always under foot. You have to think about him if only to avoid stepping on him. And after all, Hortie isn't so bad. Thinking him over from a distance, he really is rather nice. Come and sample the candy. It's wonderful. He must have blown himself and sent to Chicago for it, poor dear! I'll let you see the letter, all except the part which is too frightfully silly. You wouldn't care about that. I don't myself."

Sylvia shrugged her shoulders.

Alas, this was no moment to talk with her, and artfully draw from her the happenings of the previous day.

Inwardly distraught but outwardly calm, Marcia took the letter and tried valiantly to focus her attention upon it.

To her surprise, it was a manly, intelligent letter, filled with town gossip, to be sure, yet written in delightfully interesting fashion.

"Your Mr. Fuller sounds charming," she said as she gave it back.

"Oh, Hortie is all right—in some ways." Patronizingly slipping the letter into her pocket, Sylvia shifted the subject. Nevertheless, a betraying flush colored her cheeks. "Now we must start dinner, mustn't we? Don't you want to ask Mr. Heath which way he prefers his eggs—poached or boiled? And Marcia, while you're there, do put a pair of fresh pillow-slips on his pillows. The ones he has are frightfully tumbled. I meant to do it this morning."

As the door closed behind the elder woman, artful young Sylvia smiled.

"There! That will keep her busy for a few moments at least. I know those pillow-cases. They fit like a snake's skin and are terribly hard to get off and on."

She crept into the hall and listened. Yes, Marcia and Stanley Heath were talking. She could hear her aunt's gentle insistence and the man's protests. That was all she wished to know. The pillow-cases were in process of being taken off.

Up the stairs flew Sylvia, to return a second later, the jewel case swathed in its loose wrappings.

"If I can only scramble it in there before she comes," whispered she. "I shall draw the first long breath I've taken since last night."

An anxious interval elapsed before the brick was pried out and the case slipped beneath it. Nevertheless the feat was accomplished, and triumphant, relieved, happy Sylvia set about preparing dinner.

What a long while Marcia was staying upstairs! Why, one could change a dozen pillow-slips in this time.

"I guess they are tighter than I remembered them. I needn't have rushed as I did," pouted Sylvia. "What can she be doing?"

When at last Marcia returned, something evidently was wrong.

"What's the matter?" demanded Sylvia. "Is Mr. Heath worse?"

"Worse? No indeed. What made you think so?"

"You look fussed."

"Do I? You'd be fussed had you wrestled with those pillow-slips as I have," was the reply. "Either the pillows have swelled or the cases have shrunk frightfully. Well, they are on now, anyway."

"Come and get dinner then. I'm starved. My walk has made me hungry as a bear. You must go out this afternoon, Marcia. It is a glorious day and you need to be pepped up."

To her surprise, Marcia demurred.

"Thank you, dear, but I think I won't go out today. I'd rather sit here and read."

"Nonsense, Marcia! You're getting middle-aged and lazy. You'll lose your nice slim, hipless figure if you don't watch out."

"I'm too tired to go out."

"The air would rest you."

"Not today, dear," Marcia said with finality. "I have some mending to do and lots of other little things that I have been saving up for a long time. Since I prefer to stay, why don't you tramp up the shore and see 'My Unknown Lady'? She is beautiful and you haven't seen her yet."

"I'd love to—if I cannot coax you to go out."

"You can't. I'm adamant on not stirring out of this room."

"Well, if your mind is made up to that extent, I suppose there is no use in my trying to change it. I would like to see the boat."

"I'm sure you would. Stay as long as you like. There will be nothing to do here. Mr. Heath will probably sleep and in the meantime I shall get my sewing done."

As Marcia spoke the words, her mind was busy.

So Sylvia had not stirred from the kitchen on the previous afternoon! The theft of the jewels must, then, have taken place during the night.

Nevertheless, she was puzzled, for she had no memory of finding anything awry when she came down at sunrise to lay the fire.

When had the gems been taken, and who had taken them? No wonder she craved solitude to ponder the conundrum! This, however, was not the paramount reason she desired to be alone.

Despite the enigma of the jewels; despite the mystery surrounding Stanley Heath, deep in her heart something that would not be stilled was singing—singing!

CHAPTER VI

In the meantime, the throng of neighbors Sylvia had precipitately left in the village post office had received their mail and reached that anticipated interval for gossip which never failed to be stimulating.

Clustered about the counter loitered the standbys.

Zenas Henry was speaking:

"A mighty fine little girl—that Sylvia," commented he. "A high stepper! We'd oughter tie her down to Wilton so'st she won't go back west. She's too pretty to be spared from the Cape."

"I figger you'd have trouble keepin' her here," rejoined Sam Nickerson, the postmaster. "She's got a beau in her home town. Had a letter an' a box of candy from him today. Same writin' an' same postmark on both of 'em, I noticed."

"Didn't by any chance see the name, did you, Silas?" Eleazer Crocker inquired.

"Wal, come to think of it, it did catch my eye. You know how such things will. Fuller, he's called. Horatio Fuller."

"Horatio Fuller, eh?" Eleazer repeated. "Kinder high soundin'. Wonder who he is? From Alton City, you say."

Silas nodded.

"That was the address."

"Never heard of the place," Capt. Benjamin Todd put in.

Thoughtfully Zenas Henry stroked his chin. "If everybody knew where all the blasted places in the country were, what use would they have for maps? 'Twould put the map-makin' folks clean out of business. Say, Ephraim," inspired by a bright idea, "you're the mail carrier. You'd oughter be primed on the location of places. Where's Alton City?"

"Alton City? Hanged if I know. To hear you talk, anybody'd think 'twas my job to tote round the country deliverin' letters in person at the doors of every house in the United States."

"But you must have some notion 'bout geography. Ain't you got no pocket atlas nor nothin'?"

"I may have a small map somewheres; I carry most everything," Ephraim grinned. With deliberation, he began to disgorge upon the counter the contents of his many pockets.

Silent Moments in Which We May Review Our Deeds

Real action is in silent moments. The epochs of our life are not in the visible facts of our choice of a calling, our marriage, our acquisition of an office, and the like; but in a silent thought by the wayside as we walk—in a thought which revises our entire manner of life and says, "Thus hast thou done, but it were better thus."—Emerson.

THE DOCTORS ARE RIGHT

Women should take only liquid laxatives

Many believe any laxative they might take only makes constipation worse. And that isn't true.

Do what doctors do to relieve this condition. Doctors use liquid laxatives, and keep reducing the dose until the bowels need no help at all.

THREE STEPS TO RELIEVING CONSTIPATION

I II III

A cleansing dose today; a smaller quantity tomorrow; less each time, until bowels need no help at all.

Reduced dosage is the secret of aiding Nature in restoring regularity. You must use a little less laxative each time, and that's why your laxative should be in liquid form. A liquid dose can be regulated to the drop.

The liquid laxative generally used is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. It contains senna and cascara—both natural laxatives that form no habit even with children. Syrup Pepsin is the nicest tasting, nicest acting laxative you ever tried.

GAS, GAS ALL THE TIME, CAN'T EAT OR SLEEP

"The gas on my stomach was so bad I could not eat or sleep. Even my heart hurt. A friend suggested Adlerika. The first dose I took brought me relief. Now I eat as I wish, sleep fine and never felt better."—Mrs. Jas. Filler.

Adlerika acts on BOTH upper and lower bowels while ordinary laxatives act on the lower bowel only. Adlerika gives your system a thorough cleansing, bringing out old, poisonous matter that you would not believe was in your system and that has been causing gas pains, sour stomach, nervousness and headaches for months.

Dr. H. L. Shoub, New York, reports: "In addition to intestinal cleansing, Adlerika greatly reduces bacteria and colon bacilli."

Give your stomach and bowels a REAL cleansing with Adlerika and see how good you feel. Just one spoonful relieves GAS and chronic constipation. Sold by all druggists and drug departments.

No Need to Suffer "Morning Sickness"

"Morning sickness"—is caused by an acid condition. To avoid it, acid must be offset by alkalis—such as magnesia.

Why Physicians Recommend Milnesia Wafers

These mint-flavored, candy-like wafers are pure milk of magnesia in solid form—the most pleasant way to take it. Each wafer is approximately equal to a full adult dose of liquid milk of magnesia. Chewed thoroughly, then swallowed, they correct acidity in the mouth and throughout the digestive system and insure quick, complete elimination of the waste matters that cause gas, headaches, bloated feelings and a dozen other discomforts.

Milnesia Wafers come in bottles of 20 and 48, at 35c and 60c respectively, and in convenient tins for your handbag containing 12 at 20c. Each wafer is approximately one adult dose of milk of magnesia. All good drug stores sell and recommend them.

Honey Is Again Used for Wounds As in Days of Pliny

Honey as a dressing for wounds was popular at one time in the Middle ages. Still earlier, during the Roman empire, it enjoyed a certain vogue; and Pliny refers in a certain passage to fish fat and honey as making a good ointment for wounds. It may well be that the fish fat he refers to was cod-liver oil.

Now honey has been re-discovered as a remarkably effective ointment. In a Red Cross hospital in Hamburg, Germany, tests have been carried out with honey during the past half year, and it has been found that even much soiled wounds quickly become cleaner under its influence. But though it cleans a wound, it does not seem to make it heal more quickly than before. As cod-liver oil promotes rapid healing, it has been combined with honey in an ointment so as to achieve the double purpose of cleansing and healing.—Science Service.

With the Minnesota Lawmakers

Lacking only the formality of a signature to turn it into law, the passed old age pension bill was dispatched to Governor Olson, the house and senate having finally agreed on a comproimse plan. As passed, the bill provided for a maximum of $30 per month to needy persons over 65 years of age.

Children and near relatives of pensioners were held, under terms of the compromise bill, to be at least partially responsible for their support. Applicants of pensions were limited to property valued at $3,500 in addition to household goods, furniture, clothing, and a cemetery lot. The federal government would pay half the pensions, the state 33 1-3 per cent, and the counties 16 2-3 per cent.

But the passing of the pension bill, after stormy debate in the house, did not entirely smooth the course of the special session, as had been expected. Rural opposition to the enlargement of the 1936 relief fund tied a new knot into the already thoroughly kinked chain of legislation.

Rural opposition to the enlargement of the 1936 emergency relief fund tied the state legislature into a knot, after the old age pension bill had been passed by both houses and plans had been made to adjourn Friday, January 24. While the house pushed through a bill appropriating $3,750,000 in new funds for relief, the senate frowned on the idea, failed to take action, and proposed that the legislators stay in session at least another day to thresh out the matter of relief funds.

Senate leaders felt that $1,500,000 would be enough in new funds for relief and balked flatly at the sum set up in the house bill; but indications were that a compromise could be worked out on some figure between the two extremes. When the statemate became apparent, there were a number of suggestions that the two houses remain in session throughout the night in an effort to reach agreement. Majority opinion, however, swung in favor of postponing the final battle of the session until Friday night. It was made clear, however, that the remaining bills must be pushed through, or into the wastebasket in time for adjournment on Saturday noon.

The old age pension bill, as finally passed and sent along for the signature of Governor Olson, provides a maximum of $30 a month to needy persons over 65 years of age. As given to Governor Olson, the pension law require schildren and near relatives to be at least partially responsible for support of pensioners. Applicants for pensions are limited to property valued at $3,500 in addition to household goods, furniture, clothing and a cemetery lot. The federal government would pay half the pensions, the state 33 1-3 per cent and the counties 16 2-3 per cent.

While the pension craft was encountering stormy weather, other pieces of special legislation moved toward a more tranquil conclusion. The $83,000,00 delinquent tax bill, prepared by a conference committee also, slid through the house with but one dissenting vote. Under terms of the bill, property owners who have not paid their 1933 taxes may pay the delinquency in installments over a 10 year period. Conferees ironed out a large wrinkle in the bill when they deleted the provision stating that collected delinquent taxes would have to be applied on the bonded debt, substituting the clause that such funds collected would be used for the same purpose for which they were levied.

The state senate labor committee approved a resolution calling for an interim investigation of social security legislation with emphasis on unemployment insurance systems in other states. The proposal calls for a committee of 10, equally divided between the houses in membership, and an allowance of $10,000.

Creation of the Minnesota commission of interstate co-operation, composed of 5 house members and 5 senate members to be selected by the governor, was advocated in a joint resolution to both bodies. It was advanced that the board would encourage and arrange conferences with officials of other states and formulate proposals for co-operation between Minnesota and its neighbor states.

Both members of the senate and house will be doubly glad to get home at the end of the session, especially since new low temperatures have been recorded throughout the state.

In efforts to solve the arguments arising over the provision concerning the proportion of the pension fund to be paid by the state and the county, the conference committee had decided that the federal government should bear 50 per cent of the cost, the state 33 1/3 per cent, and the county 16 2-3 per cent. Originally, the senate had proposed that state and county pay 25 per cent, while the house had suggested a 37½ per cent levy on the state and a 12½ per cent levy on the county.

Idolatry of Self-Destruction.

SANTA MONICA, CALIF.—Once upon a time there was a strange race that, while in some ways quite civilized, yet worshiped a murderous and a monstrous god.

Now this god demanded human sacrifice. He had high priests who ministered to his images; he had countless devotees who traveled about, gathering in the victims to feed his cravings. The feeble and the careless, the aged dodderer and the unwary child—these were the favorite offerings. Yet the collectors spared none at all, neither the strong nor the halt nor the helpless. Often, in their madness, they destroyed one another. Each year the cruel tally mounted—so many thousands dead, so many hundreds of thousands crippled and broken.

These curious people lived in a place called America, and the god they worshiped was called Speed.

The World-Problem-Solvers.

I'M CONSTANTLY running into somebody who knows exactly what's wrong with the world and what ought to be done about it, but can't make up his mind whether to have his eggs fried on one side or turned over.

At lunch today, I encountered one gentleman who could diagnose all our political and economic ills—just like that!—and name the remedies, too. In fact he did name quite a few while I was looking after the check. And yet I know for a positive fact that his wife won't let him pick out his own neckties and he can't be trusted to cross the street by himself, owing to not being able to decide off-hand which automobile he prefers to be hit by.

Sometimes I think one of our troubles is that we have among us too many who know practically everything and too few who can do anything practically.

The Passing of Kipling.

TWENTY-THREE years ago, I visited Rudyard Kipling at his home in Sussex. Gracious in his hospitality, he nevertheless was already showing signs of the mania for seclusion which, following the death of his only son in the World war, made of him an entrenched recluse.

He shunned people; shunned things; shunned the pageantry of life. He developed an active dislike for Americans—the people whom he once loved and who constituted perhaps his most loyal following. He became that most lamentable of figures among literary folk—the spot marked "D," denoting where a quenched genius was last seen.

Most of us who write are but assimilators and assemblers. Here was a real creator, and real creators don't happen often. His jungle books and his barrack-room ballads; his Mulvaney and his Kim—these will live while men read English and speak it. May that be balm to his passing soul!

Acting for the Movies.

OUT here on this lot, we're finishing up the first moving picture in which Ye Scribe has had a real chance to give his all to art. The picture's to be called "Everybody's Old Man"—that is unless the producers change their minds at the last minute, as is customary, and re-title it "The Rollo Boys in an Igloo" or something.

None of us seemed to feel it while we were shooting scenes, but if everybody is as tired as the old man is, they won't have to rock anybody to sleep. The head cameraman goes on a rest cure soon, and the director's wife just telephoned that she's a little bit worried about him—he keeps hearing brass bands playing, and a while ago he ran out and tried to stop a runaway horse that wasn't there.

I've found out one thing: acting for the movies provides a complete mental rest, but it's very hard on the feet.

Tattooed Ladies.

IN A theatrical paper I read that one of the most copiously illustrated tattooed ladies in the business is fixing to be divorced from a husband who's also of the sideshowing profession. I remember the lady well, sitting on a platform and, in response to requests, slowly turning around so the audience could see what she had to say on the other side.

Well, every man to his taste, but I've always figured life would be kind of fascinating with a tattooed lady for a helpmate. Any time you got tired of talking, you could ask her to let you look at the pictures. And what a boon t'would be for the children, having a comic section for a parent, and vice versa.

Namesakes of Heroes.

IT'S getting so you can tell when twenty-one years have passed since some great national figure—a president, or maybe a military hero—was at the peak of his popularity. It's when a lot of his namesakes get too old for the reform school and are just the right age for the penitentiary. Once in a while one of the crop goes into the ministry, but apparently not enough of them to make much difference in the grand total.

Toy Railroading Is Rapid Growing Hobby Among Men

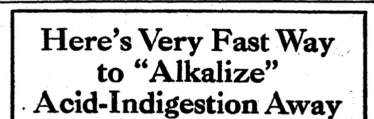
Nearly every large city has its miniature railroad society whose members own elaborate systems ranging in cost from about $30 for small electric lines to $10,000 for real models which run under their own steam over a mile of track, hauling ten tons at 30 miles an hour.—Collier's.

Here's Record That'll Make Holmes Do Highland Fling

One of the greatest detectives alive is a native of French Indo-China, who is known as "The Bloodhound." His captures average one murderer every 25 days for the past 28 years.

He is credited with taking 400 of the 1,200 men who are now serving life sentences for homicide on Pulo Condore, the French "murderers' isle" in the China sea, from which no one has ever escaped.—Collier's.



Here's Very Fast Way to "Alkalize" Acid-Indigestion Away

Amazingly Fast Relief Now from "Acid Indigestion" Over-Indulgence, Nausea, and Upsets

IF you want really quick relief from an upset or painful stomach condition—arising from acidity following over-eating, smoking, mixtures of foods or stimulants—just try this:

Take—2 teaspoonfuls of Phillips' Milk of Magnesia in a full glass of water. OR—2 Phillips' Milk of Magnesia Tablets, the exact equivalent of the liquid form.

This acts almost immediately to alkalize the excess acid in the stomach. Neutralizes the acids that cause headaches, nausea, and indigestion pains. You feel results at once.

Try it. AND—if you are a frequent sufferer from "acid stomach," use Phillips' Milk of Magnesia 30 minutes after meals. You'll forget you have a stomach!

When you buy, see that any box or bottle you accept is clearly marked "Genuine Phillips' Milk of Magnesia."

Boy Scouts Attend Church

The local Boy Scout troop presented a wonderful sight last Sunday morning when 14 Boy Scouts and their Scoutmaster, Hartley Peterson, "trooped" into the Nazareth Lutheran Church to attend morning services.

The Scouts have now passed their Tenderfoot tests and came to church wearing their Neckerchiefs. They sat thru services very attentive, and all raised their voices in singing of the hymns.

Hartley Peterson is to be commended on the work he is doing with our boys. The Boy Scout Organization is one that is run entirely without wages or pay to the leaders, and in this busy world of ours we find very few who are willing to work that way.

All boys in those ages are in the stage where they must have somethieg to do in their leisure time. The fact that the right paths are shown to them in this work is a boon to the community that cannot be measured and the good derived will go on and on thru time.

We mothers and fathers of the Boy Scouts, are we in any way showing our appreciation of this work?

Cattle on Feed Increased 40% In Corn States

Going from one extreme to another, the corn belt is full tilt in the cattle feeding business following a year of light feeding due to short crops in 1934. The percentage increase in feeding this year over last year is the largest ever shown in the 14 years for which records have been kept, contrasted with the greatest decrease ever shown from January 1, 1934 to January 1, 1935.

The number of cattle on feed for market in the eleven corn belt states on January 1, this year, was 41 percent larger than the very small number on feed a year ago, according to statistics gathered by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics. Despite the sharp increase in feeding over last year, the estimated number of cattle on feed now is still materially below the average for January 1 for the period from 1930 to 1934. The number of cattle on feed at present is around 25 to 30 percent below the five-year average for Jan. 1.

Reports from Corn Belt feeders regarding the weights of cattle indicate that there is a larger proportion of heavier feeders in the country and a decreased proportion of calves on feed.

As to the probable months of marketing the cattle on feed this year, reports indicate that a larger proportion of the total will be marketed before May 1 than a year ago.

Slaughter supplies of cattle during the next few months are expected to reflect an increase in feeding and, although slaughter is expected to be smaller than last year, the proportion of feed cattle is expected to be materially larger, with the great bulk of these cattle being medium to good steers. The reduced supply of cows and low grade steers is expected to support prices of common steers and most butcher stock, the prices of which will probably strengthen.

WPA Will Pay the Prevailing Wages

Prevailing wage jobs on Public Works Administration and other federal agency projects will be available this month for approximately 9,000 Works Progress administration workers. Victor Christgau, state WPA administrator, announced today.

Mr. Christgau said the 9,000 prevailing wage jobs include some available at once while others have been definitely scheduled for February. The schedule, he added, will be changed only if inclement weather makes it impossible to start work on some of the projects as planned.

Before May 1, more than 30,000 prevailing wage jobs will be available to WPA workers through other federal agencies launching projects in the state, the administrator said.

"Preference will be given to those WPA workers who specifically request the prevailing wage." Mr. Christgau explained. "A number of organizations have approached us on this subject recently. We have more requisitions for other federal agency projects than we have been able to fill and we therefore, are planning to issue transfers immediately upon receipt of requests from any WPA workers."

Questioned in regard to the state-wide WPA workers' conference, Mr. Christgau pointed out that "requisitions of other federal agencies for men to be employed at the prevailing wage rate considerably outnumber the current requests for these jobs. We shall be glad to take care of all petitioners who desire transfers."

Minnesota Pastors to Meet at Mpls. Feb. 14

More than 500 pastors from the Protestant Churches of Minnesota are expected to attend the Fourth State Pastors Conference at Wesley Methodist Church, Minneapolis on February 17-18-19. The invitation to attend the conference has gone to 2,000 pastors, and in addition, to all ministerial students in the Seminaries of Minnesota.

Many phases of the theme "The Minister's Share in Building a Christian World", will be considered. Addresses will be given by Toyohiko Kagawa, Christian evangelist of Japan; Dr. E. W. Praetorius, Bishop of the Northwestern Area of the Evangelical Church, St. Paul; Dr. Harold Cooke Phillips, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Cleveland; Dr. Paul E. Sherer, pastor of the Lutheran Church of the Holy Trinity of New York City, and the Rt. Rev. George Craig Stewart D. D., Bishop of the diocese of Chicago of the Protestant Episcopal Church, Chicago.

The devotional services and the discussion groups will be led by prominent Minnesota clergymen. In addition to music by Minneapolis Church Choirs, the conference music will include music by Miss Hope Hauzel, harpist.

The conference is being entertained by the Minneapolis Ministers Federation of which Dr. Bertram B. Hanscom, pastor of the Park Avenue Congregational Church is the chairman.

The conference is open to all ministers and to ministerial students. The Monday afternoon session will be open to laymen outside of the Twin Cities only. The Tuesday evening session will be open to the public. Admission will be charged for the two open sessions.

The conference opens at two o'clock Monday afternoon, February 17th and closes at noon Wednesday, February 19th.

The Conference is promoted by a Volunteer Committee composed of unofficial representatives from more than twenty denominations and communions and five interdenominational agencies. The chairman of the Volunteer Committee for the 1936 conference is the Rt. Rev. Stephen E. Keeler D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of the Minnesota Diocese of the Protestant Episcopal Church, Minneapolis.

Oslo, Norway Will Be Sunday School Convention City

Sunday School workers from nearly every country in the world, and from all Protestant Evangelical Denominations, will attend the Twelfth World's Sunday School Convention to be held at Oslo, Norway, July 6-12, 1936.

Oslo is the most northerly city yet chosen for a World's Sunday School Convention. Other conventions have been held at Glasgow, Jerusalem, Rome, Tokyo and other large cities throughout the world. The last quadrennial convention met at Rio de Janiero in 1932.

Norway has never before had so significant a world gathering of Christian forces. The Rt. Rev. Johan Lunde, Bishop Primate of Norway, writes, "We shall do our best to see that the delegates are well taken care of in our beautiful and beloved country. We are very happy to be able to relate that our Country's King, His Majesty Haakon VII, has promised to act as the Convention's guardian."

The theme, "Christ the Hope of the World" has been chosen for the convention. Eminent churchmen and outstanding Christian statesmen have accepted places on the program. Every phase of the program of Christian Education will be considered.

The convention is held under the auspices of the World's Sunday School Association, with headquarters in New York City. Dr. Robert M. Hopkins is the General Secretary. Dr. Hopkins was on the program of the Minnesota State Sunday School convention at Redwood Falls on October 24th and 25th, 1936.

Minnesota has a quota of 50 delegates for the Oslo Convention. The delegation is being secured thru the Minnesota Council of Religious Education with Headquarters at 405 Oppenheim Building, St. Paul, H. L. Stright, General Secretary.

The official Minnesota delegation will sail from New York on the Steam Ship "Stavangerfjord" on June 24th.

Information concerning the Convention may be secured from the office of the Minnesota Council of Religious Education.

DEVIL APPEARS IN 4-HORNED RABBIT

Elk River—Horned rabbits are not at all common, and when Fred Pieri, who lives on a farm about three miles east of Elk River, shot a rabbit recently and found it had four distinct horns growing on top of its head, he thought it was quite a curiosity. The rabbit had been hanging around the buildings on the Pieri farm for some time, and he finally got a shot at it. The rabbit appeared to be normal otherwise, but the horns were about an inch long and were of a hard bony substance.

Feed The Birds

Have you stopped to think of how hard it must be to go hungry? Think of the poor game birds we have in this part of the state and community that are going hurgry most of the time trying to find a little to eat since the heavy snow covered up all their natural food supply. Hang out a few cobs of corn in some good spot and put out a box of small grain.

Save the hatching stock now. Let us see the sportsmen in Holt make a pool and buy a few bushels of feed for the birds around here. If you do this you will get your name in the sportsmen's magazine.

The Weather

The winter's severest and most general snowstorm reaching blizzard proportions in many areas, whipped the Northwest Saturday afternoon and evening.

Snow was piled high here and side roads and village streets were blocked to auto traffic.

Disrupting railroad traffic in the, Grand Forks area and throughout North Dakota and Minnesota, blocking highways in the same territory isolating scores of communities, the storm increased the threat of fuel and food shortages in many cities in southern Minnesota.

Four deaths in Minnesota were attributed directly to the bitter cold.

Holt and vicinity and a heavy snowfall on Saturday and most of the side roads in this community are blocked to auto travel.

The weather has been cold all week until Wednesday morning when finally the wind turned and blew from south.

TRAIN KILLS HORSE IN FREAK ACCIDENT

Benson—Death swooped down on two Benson farmers at the rate of 70 miles an hour recently, only to be cheated when a horse was stripped of its harness and carried 100 feet up the railroad track, leaving the other horse, the sleigh, and two men unharmed. L. Reishen and Otto Puchulske were driving their sleigh into town and did not see the fast mail train, three hours behind schedule and trying to make up time. With the train almost on top of them, Puchulske swerved the team to the right and away from the train. This move brought the sleigh and its occupants out of danger, but the engine struck the horse on the left side. The animal, instantly killed, was hurled completely out of its harness 100 feet down the track. The remaining horse escaped injury, and no appreciable damage was done to the sleigh or the two men, who leaped to safety.

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

Are you a safe driver? The driver is responsible for more than 90 percent of all highway accidents.

Someone has asked me whether highway accidents are inevitable. The answer of science is no. Three out of four drivers have no accidents at all. Of American drivers 25 percent have all of the accidents. This means that one-fourth of the drivers were responsible for nearly one million persons injured and about 36,000 deaths in 1934.

There are three types of drivers. One group is the safe group, which comprises about 75 percent of the drivers. About 20 percent may be called accident liable. They have accidents due to some psychological or phpsical weakness. The remaining 2 percent may be called the accideat prone group. They get into trouble because of some marked deficiency.

It is up to all of us to start working on the 25 percent that cause the accidents so the driving conditions will be safer for the other 75 percent and also for the 25 percent. You can help.

BOY'S LIFE SAVED WHEN ROAD PLOW PILES UP SNOW

Zumbro Falls—Buried in the snow beneath an over-turned car, an 11 year old boy probably escaped death or serious injury because the highway plow had piled snow in the ditch a minute before. Kenneth Atkinson and his brother Merele were standing beside the road waiting for their father, who was to take them to Zumbro Falls. The snow plow passed them, throwing a high, soft bank of snow to the side of the road. Immediately after, a car driven by a Lake City man at a high rate of speed dodged the plow and struck Kenneth as the car went into the ditch. The car was lifted and the boy dug out of the snow. He escaped with only minor injuries.

One of the strangest of modern pistols is the one which looks like a pipe and which may be carried in the mouth like an ordinary pipe. A 25-caliber bullet is fired through the innocent looking stem, while the bowl is a magazine for five extra cartridges.

IT WORKED FOR ME

Women should take only liquid laxatives

MORE people could feel fine, be fit and regular, if they would only follow the rule of doctors and hospitals in relieving constipation.

Never take any laxative that is harsh in action. Or one, the dose of which can't be exactly measured. Doctors know the danger if this rule is violated. They use liquid laxatives, and keep reducing the dose until the bowels need no help at all.

Reduced dosage is the secret of aiding Nature in restoring regularity. You must use a little less laxative each time, and that's why it should be a liquid like Syrup Pepsin.

Ask your druggist for a bottle of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, and if it doesn't give you absolute relief, if it isn't a joy and comfort in the way it overcomes biliousness due to constipation, your money back.

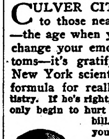
what Irvin S. Cobb thinks about:

Middle Age and Painless Dentistry.

CULVER CITY.—Especially to those nearing middle age—the age when you begin to exchange your emotions for symptoms—it's gratifying to hear a New York scientist has hit on a formula for really painless dentistry. If he's right, the operation will only begin to hurt when you get the bill. Time was when you could hang onto your stately ruins until there was English ivy growing on them. Nowadays, no matter what ails you, they X-ray your teeth, which is a mistake to begin with, because I never yet saw an X-ray photograph that was flattering. And the next thing you know, you've a taste in your mouth like a druggist's dishrag; and your face looks like an old-fashioned buckskin purse, with the draw-string coming undone; and, on the inside, feels as empty as a haunted house.



Irvin S. Cobb.

Still, getting the upper plate from a mail order house has its compensations. Hot soup no longer makes blisters in the palate. Just a slight smell of burning rubber—that's all.

And a beautiful brilliant new set, shimmering from a tumbler of water alongside the reading lamp, certainly does brighten up the boudoir.

* * *

A True Maker of Melodies.

THEY gave a dinner here to the son of desperately poor immigrants, a modest, kindly little man who started life as a singing waiter in a bowery bar-room. The dinner celebrated his silver jubilee as a maker of melodies. It has been just 25 years since he set the toes of the nation to tingling with "Alexander's Ragtime Band."

I can think of an occasional popular composer, who might be defined as a person who has a good memory and hopes no one else has; just as now and then—but this is a trade secret—you strike a writer who is getting by not because he is such a good writer, but because he has been such a close reader.

But for Irving Berlin, it may be said that his lyrics are his own and his airs are his own and his ideas are his own. Maybe that's why his tuneful output is so good—it reflects the spirit of an authentic creator, a genuine minstrel bard.

* * *

The Great Republican Hope.

I NEVER thought the stocks that licked the desert and the Apaches would be slackers, but neither in Arizona nor in New Mexico can I find trace of an authentic Presidential boom for any home-grown statesman. On the other hand, the sheep crop is reported good.

Maybe it's just as well. Already there has been more than one favorite son boom that reminded me of a new trunk store on a side street—you know, the kind that always opens with a grand closing-out sale.

Republicans here speak highly of Governor Landon of Kansas. Still, you never can tell. If you can believe what the Sunday papers print when the editors can't think of anything else, tragedy always followed owning the Hope diamond or digging into King Tut's tomb. But being indorsed for office by W. R. Hearst is pretty fatal, too, seems to me.

* * *

A New Kind of Inflation.

WHEN one of the New Deal groups—the President's consumers' council—announced the other day that Americans have larger hips than formerly, I just said: "Well, I'm glad things are expanding. There were several years when nothing I owned showed a tendency to go up except my blood pressure, and if hips are spreading, it merely means wider detours for a fellow when dancing on a crowded floor."

But now another White House pet, the Works Progress administration, gives a real thrill by promising to expose spinach, proving there are plenty of vegetables just as good for the diet, that taste like something and not like spinach. Maybe they'll yet find a use for spinach—by applying it externally, say? Personally I'd rather wear it in my hair than try to eat it. So would you, reader, if you were only brave enough to come out with the truth.

* * *

England's New King.

IN THE matter of their ruling monarchs, the English are luckier than some. The crown is never tarnished nor the people ever shamed, for all their kings are gentlemen and all their queens are queens. That's why, I think, Britain will keep her royal line, while we keep our flag, which ought to be quite a long spell, in case any communistic person should ask you.

So, to the witty and engaging youngish gentleman, who picks up the mantle that slipped from the tired shoulders of a kindly and gracious elderly gentleman, we over here offer our best wishes. We know Your Majesty invariably will show good taste, and whilst you may not always do the right thing—that would be asking too much of any man—we're dead sure you'll always say it.

Constructive Suggestions or Complaints: Which Get Results?

First Method Fosters Good Will; Second Causes Annoyance.

There are two ways of accomplishing things which one has to get done. One is to complain that things are not as they should be. The other is to make constructive suggestions and request that they be followed out. The first method is apt to annoy the person conferred with. The second appeals to his sense of justice, and, if the suggestion is a good one and within reason, it is generally heeded. Assuming that, in both cases the thing gets done, in the first instance, annoyance prevails, while in the second, good will is fostered. You will remember the old adage that you can catch more flies with molasses, than vinegar. In other words you can get more accomplished by keeping good tempered and sweet, than by getting annoyed and sour tempered.

Getting Things Accomplished.

It is well to remember these methods for family use, and for civic purposes. It does not mean that one can get things done merely by being good natured. There must be a plus to it. There must be continual effort in the right direction, until the point is won. And when there has been no hard feeling created, and the matter is seen to, there is likely to be a feeling of satisfaction on the side of both parties, each being pleased that a good thing has resulted.

It was by the recommended method that a woman succeeded in getting a bench put on a waiting station platform. She appealed to the correct authorities, telling of the genuine need for such a bench, as tired persons found it almost more than they could endure to stand from ten to twenty minutes, more or less, according to the connection of one car with another at this junction. At first, came a note stating that her request had been noted, and formally thanking her for letting them know of her wish; nothing more, and nothing was done.

A Restful Bench.

It was only after repeated appeals, and continued assertions that the company would be treating their patrons with consideration by putting the bench at the place suggested, that finally she succeeded. And now, not only are her own trips to the city made less tiresome, but hundreds of other persons daily find the seat a blessing.

Another instance comes to mind. Repeated accidents of major and minor severity occurred at a certain city corner, by autos colliding. A woman requested the city to install STOP BEFORE CROSSING signs by the curb at each corner of the cross street. Since her request was heeded, fewer catastrophes have occurred, and there need be none, if only motorists would heed them. She did not complain, but she made a good suggestion in a good way, and won her point to the comfort of all but the reckless.

A Grave Mistake for a Mother to Make

GIVING CHILD UNKNOWN REMEDIES WITHOUT ASKING DOCTOR FIRST

GIVING your child a medicine or remedy you don't know all about — without asking your family doctor first — is a bad risk for any mother to take.

Doctors and child authorities say health, and sometimes life itself, depends on this.

So — when you're offered a "bargain" in a remedy for your child; ask your doctor before you buy it. Do this for your child's sake and your own peace of mind.

Ask him particularly about the frequently used "milk of magnesia" — about Phillips' Milk of Magnesia. He will tell you that for over 60 years physicians have endorsed it as SAFE for your child. The kind of remedy you want your child to have.

Remember this when you buy, and say "Phillips' Milk of Magnesia" to your druggist. Comes now, also, in tablets that taste of peppermint, that children like to take.

Washington Monument Has Defied Lightning for Years

High winds and electrical storms invariably bring calls to the weather bureau from citizens wondering if the Washington monument is still intact. People wonder why no serious damage has been done to the monolith by the heavy static discharges. Capping the 55 feet of granite is a pyramid of aluminum, 5.6 by 8.9 inches in size, and weighing 100 ounces. This was the largest single piece of aluminum cast up to that time—1884. Except for sporadic strikes which have run down the rods harmlessly, no bolt has ever left its calling card on the face of the column despite the great conductivity of aluminum.

The aluminum tip was placed over the projecting point of an iron rod, to which are attached wires leading to the ground as lightning conductors. The ground wires end in a 40-foot well immediately below the elevator shaft, thus precluding all possibility of damage.—Washington Post.

BEFORE you take any preparation you don't know all about, for the relief of headaches; or the pains of rheumatism, neuritis or neuralgia, ask your doctor what he thinks about it — in comparison with Genuine Bayer Aspirin.

We say this because, before the discovery of Bayer Aspirin, most so-called "pain" remedies were advised against by physicians as being bad for the stomach; or, often, for the heart. And the discovery of Bayer Aspirin largely changed medical practice.

Countless thousands of people who have taken Bayer Aspirin year in and out without ill effect, have proved that the medical findings about its safety were correct.

Remember this: Genuine Bayer Aspirin is rated among the fastest methods yet discovered for the relief of headaches and all common pains . . . and safe for the average person to take regularly.

You can get real Bayer Aspirin at any drug store — simply by never asking for it by the name "aspirin" alone, but always saying BAYER ASPIRIN when you buy.

SYNOPSIS

The future of the youthful and comely "Widder" Marcia Howe is a conversational tit-bit among housewives of Wilton. Eligible bachelors and widowers also are interested. Marcia has as her guest her late husband's niece, Sylvia Hayden. A stranger, on the verge of exhaustion, finds his way to Marcia's home. Secretly, he asks her to hide a package containing jewelry. She does so. Elisha Winslow, town sheriff, brings news of a jewel robbery nearby. The stranger gives his name as Stanley Heath. Sylvia discovers the jewels, and naturally believes Heath is a robber. She realizes that Marcia must have hidden them, and decides to say nothing. Marcia feels she has altogether too deep an interest in her guest, but is powerless to overcome it. Heath wires "Mrs. S. C. Heath," New York, saying he is safe. He also orders a man named Currier to come at once. Sylvia, in her room, bedecks herself with the jewels. At Marcia's approach she hides them there. Heath asks Marcia to bring them to him. They are gone! He kindly makes light of the loss. Sylvia restores the jewels to their original hiding place.

"Ought to be in my breast pocket," thrusting his hand inside his pea-coat. "My eye! If I ain't forgot that telegram!" he abruptly exclaimed. "The station-master at Sawyer Falls gave it to me when he handed out the mail. It clean went out of my mind. It's for that chap Heath who's stayin' over at 'The Widder's.'"

"Hadn't you been wool-gatherin' you might 'a' given it to Sylvia to take back with her. She was here only a little while ago," Silas Nickerson said.

"I know it."

"S'pose I was to take it over," Elisha Winslow suggested eagerly. "I'm willin' to."

"Fur's that goes, I can carry it," Capt. Phineas Taylor piped.

"Now, there's no use in all you fellers volunteerin'," Eleazer Crocker asserted. "I'm goin' straight over to Marcia's, as it happens, soon's I've et my dinner, an' I'll take the telegram."

With an air of authority, he held out his hand.

The crowd fell back.

* * * * * * *

Early afternoon found Marcia alone in the Homestead sitting room. Sylvia had gone up the beach. Stanley Heath was asleep; and at last the delicious interval of solitude which the woman coveted was here.

The basket at her elbow overflowed with mending, but she had not yet taken up her needle.

She could not work. Try as she would, her mind wandered off into byways too fascinating to be resisted—byways which no matter how remote their windings, invariably led her back to Stanley Heath.

In retrospect she lived over again every incident, every word, every look that had passed between them, until she came to the barrier of the unknown which her fancy bridged with intricate rainbow-hued imaginings. She twisted possible explanations this way and that and would contentedly have continued the pastime had not Eleazer Crocker knocked at the door.

Eleazer could not have chosen a more inopportune moment to drag her back to earth.

With a frown and a deep sigh, Marcia went reluctantly to let him in.

"Wal, now ain't it nice to find you by yourself!" was his greeting. "The kitchen looks cozy as can be. Where was you settin'?"

"I was in the front room, but perhaps we better drop down here so I can listen in case Mr. Heath should call."

"Anywhere you say. Wherever you are suits me."

The kitchen was warm, Marcia was alone and apparently not busy. Could circumstances be more propitious? Fortune certainly was with him. Today, this very afternoon, he would take his future in his hands and put to her the question he had so often determined to put.

"Weather's been fine, ain't it?" he started out.

Marcia took up her sewing.

"Do you think so?" questioned she, raising her brows. "Seems to me we've had lots of rain and fog."

"Wal, yes, now you mention it I do recall a few thick days. Still, spring is comin'."

"I'd like to shingle the south ell this spring," announced Marcia, giving a disconcertingly practical twist to the conversation. "How many shingles do you suppose it would take?"

Eleazer frowned. The dialogue was not proceeding along the lines he had mapped out.

"I'd have to reckon that out. It's a good notion, though, to make the ell tight. That's what the birds are doin'. They're gettin' their nests built, an' kinder pickin' out their mates."

"I did not realize you were so much interested in birds, Eleazer," Marcia exclaimed. "I have a fine bird book I must lend you. It's in the other room. I'll fetch it."

Springing up, she disappeared.

"Drat it!" murmured Eleazer. "Could anything be more exasperatin'? An' me neither knowin' nor carin' a hang whether a bird's a robin or a sparrow." He wandered to the window. "Oh, heavens, who's this comin'? If it ain't 'Lish Winslow! Now what in thunder does he want, buttin' in?"

Eleazer threw open the door.

Before he could speak, however, Elisha puffing and out of breath bawled:

"Where in the name of goodness did you put the engine-house key, Eleazer? Whipple's hen house is afire an' we've hunted high an' low for it."

"My soul an' body," Eleazer gasped. "I clean forgot to leave it. Must be in my pocket."

Wildly he began to search.

"You're a fine head of the fire department, you are!" roared Elisha. "If you'd put your mind on town business 'stead of on Marcia Howe, we'd all be better off. Trapsing over here to see her in the middle of the day, palmin' off that telegram as an excuse. You better go straight back to the village fast as you can leg it an' carry the key with you," went on the accuser. "Don't wait for nothin'. I'll explain matters to Marcia."

"But I've got to see her. I've got to speak to her private," protested the wretched official. "I want to give her somethin'."

"Give it to me. I'll hand it to her."

Elisha's extended palm was not to be ignored.

"This — this — telegram," quavered Eleazer. "I ain't had a chance to—"

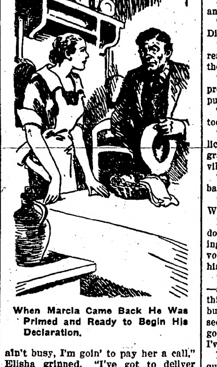
"Do you mean to say you ain't given her that telegram yet?"

"I was intendin' to. I was just about to when—"

"Wal, of all the—" words failed Elisha. "Here, give it to me," he commanded. "I can be depended on to deliver messages if you can't. I'll see she has it. In the meantime, the best thing you can do is to hoof it to town quick's ever you can."

"Ain't you comin'?"

"I? No. Fire's ain't in my line. Long's Marcia's here by herself an' ain't busy, I'm goin' to pay her a call," Elisha grinned. "I've got to deliver the telegram."



When Marcia Came Back He Was Primed and Ready to Begin His Declaration.

"You might be needed at the fire."

"I shan't be," was the calm reply. "Not unless there's somethin' criminal about it."

"It might be arson."

"I'll take a chance on it startin' from Dan Whipple's cigarette. In fact he owned as much. Now, hop along, Eleazer, else the whole conflagration will be out 'fore you get there."

The unlucky fire chief had no choice.

"Drat it!" raged he, as he strode off across the sand. "Drat it! Ain't that just my luck!"

Either the book for which Marcia searched was not to be found or she was in no haste to return to her awaiting suitor.

In the meantime Elisha, like his predecessor, was formulating his mode of attack. Might not this be his own golden opportunity?

Before another snatched the prize from him; before Heath with his yacht and his monogrammed silken garments recovered his strength, he would put his fate to the test.

He strolled up to the stove and, standing on the hearth with his back to the fire, rocked back and forth on his heels reflectively.

As he did so, a brick beneath his feet rocked with him.

Elisha looked down.

He saw it was quite loose.

"That thing's goin' to trip up somebody some fine day," commented he. "It oughter be cemented."

Producing his knife, Elisha pried the brick from its place.

As he lifted it out, a handkerchief came with it disgorging at his feet a flat, blue leather case.

If the sheriff's eyes bulged when he caught sight of it, they all but popped from his head when, egged on by curiosity, he pressed the catch on the box.

Quick as a flash the whole situation clarified in his mind.

These were the widely heralded Long Island jewels; and the thief who had stolen them was here beneath this roof!

It was as plain as a pikestaff. Hidden by fog he had escaped in his boat and inadvertently run aground at the mouth of Wilton harbor.

Of course Marcia did not know. Even though a friendship existed between herself and Heath, she was unquestionably ignorant of the nefarious means by which he earned his living.

Far from cherishing anger or resentment toward the person who exposed his villainy and prevented her from sacrificing herself to such an unprincipled adventurer, would she not regard her rescuer with deepest gratitude? Elisha's head whirled.

Nevertheless, confused though he was, it was clear to him he must not make a mis-step and neglect to perform his official duty with dignity.

Heath was ill. There would be no danger of his leaving the Homestead at present, especially as he had no suspicion the jewels had been discovered.

The best plan was for him to return to the mainland; get his badge and handcuffs; find out what formalities such a momentous event as an arrest demanded; and return later and round up the criminal.

He did not dally. Carefully putting the gems back where he had found them, he placed the telegram upon the table and went out, softly closing the door behind him.

It flashed into his mind that as the tide was coming in it might be well to borrow Marcia's boat and row back to shore.

This would serve two purposes. He would reach home sooner; and Heath; cut off by the sweep of the channel, would in the meantime be unable to escape.

Never had Elisha rowed as he rowed that day! The dory fairly leaped through the water. Reaching shore, he sprang from it and dragged it up on the sand. Then, trembling with excitement, he set out for home.

He was almost at his gate when to his consternation he saw Eleazer puffing after him.

"You didn't make much of a stop at The Widder's, I see," jeered he.

"No. Had other business," came crisply from Elisha.

"You 'pear to be kinder stirred up, 'Lish," Eleazer commented. "What's the matter?"

Elisha determined upon a sudden and bold move.

"Say, Eleazer," began he cautiously, Did you ever see a man arrested?"

"Wal, I dunno as I ever did—not really. I've seen it done, though, in the movies."

"That oughter be up-to-date an' proper. Just how was the proceedin' put through?"

"Wal, near's I can recollect, the policeman went up to the criminal an' grabbin' him by the arm says: 'You villain! I've got you now. Scram!'"

"I s'pose the policeman wore a badge an' carried handcuffs."

"Oh, law, yes. But what's the game? What do you want to know for?"

Furtively Elisha glanced up and down the empty road and after peering over his shoulder, he dropped his voice to a confidential whisper and hissed:

"'Cause I'm goin' to make an arrest—a big arrest! I've tracked down the thief that committed the Long Island burglary. Moreover, I know this very second where the jewels are. I'm goin' to phone the New York police I've got their man," he concluded.

Eleazer's cunning mind worked quickly.

"I don't know, 'Lish, as I'd do that," he cautioned. "In the first place, you might be mistook in your calculations an' not only get yourself into hot water but make the town a laughin' stock. Furthermore, was you wrong, you might get sued for defamin' the accused's character."

"I ain't wrong. I'm right."

"Wal, even so, I'd move careful," urged his companion. "Most likely there's a reward out for this criminal. Why split it with a host of others? Why don't you an' me divide it? I'll help you land your man, since you're a bit—" Eleazer, fearing to offend, hesitated, "—a bit out of practice 'bout arrestin'."

The advice was good. Elisha, shrewd in his dealings, instantly saw the advantages of the plan proposed.

"Wal, mebbe 'twould be better if I didn't let too many ignorant city chaps in on a big thing like this," he conceded pompously. "You an' me know what we're about. I figger we could handle it."

"Sure we could. We can put it through in first-class shape. First you must change your clothes for your Sunday ones. A black frock coat's what you really oughter wear. Then you must pin your sheriff's badge on your chest where it'll show good an' plain. Be sure to bring along your handcuffs, 'cause you're certain to need 'em with an experienced criminal such as this. He'll have a gun an' put up a fight."

Elisha paled and a tremor twitched his lips.

"That needn't concern you none, though. All you'll have to do will be to steal up behind him, put your pistol 'twixt his shoulder-blades an' shout: 'Stick 'em up!'"

"I ain't got no pistol. I ain't fond of fire-arms. In fact, I don't know's I ever shot off a revolver in my life."

"Wal, I have. I've shot dozens of skunks."

"You might lend me yours."

"I s'pose I might. It ain't, though, workin' very well right now. It's kinder rusty. Furthermore, I'm out of ammunition."

"That wouldn't matter. I ain't calculatin' to fire it."

"But you'll have to."

There Is No "Bad Luck" in Cake Making and Baking

It Is All in Knowing How, Says Food Expert; a Cake Batter Test.

Have you ever heard a woman sigh, "Oh, dear, I have had bad luck with my cake today?" I always feel sorry for a woman who makes that kind of a remark, because I know what good materials have probably gone into the cake, and how much time she has spent for nothing. I also know that she need not have had "bad luck" because there is really no such thing in cake making and baking. It is all in knowing how, says a well-known food expert.

Here are a few of the "hows": Use cake or pastry flour when possible. In case bread flour is used the mixture may be slightly thicker and may need a little extra liquid. Sift flour before measuring.

Cream the butter and sugar thoroughly to make the texture of the cake fine.

As eggs differ in size and as flour differs in power to take up liquid, it is not possible for a recipe to be absolutely accurate so far as liquid is concerned. It may be necessary to add more liquid to make a batter to proper thickness. To test a cake-batter for thickness: If the batter breaks at the edge of the spoon when held above the bowl, it is too thick. If it runs all the way down without breaking, it is too thin. If it breaks halfway between the spoon and the bowl, it is just the right thickness.

If yolks and whites of eggs are beaten separately, the texture of the cake will be light. If they are beaten together, the texture will be closer, but the cake will keep moist longer. If only the whites of the eggs are used, the cake will be rich and moist.

Although the use of generous quantities of butter and eggs produces a rich cake with good keeping qualities, the amounts may be lessened if the cake is to be eaten at once.

Divide the time for baking into three parts. First part: The mixture should rise. Second part: The mixture should finish rising and begin to brown. Third part: The mixture should finish browning and shrink from the sides of the pan. To test for a thorough cooking, touch the center lightly with the finger, and if the crust does not recede, take from the oven and "listen." When completely done there will be no singing sound which is characteristic of a baking mixture. If it is not done, it may be returned to the oven at once and left for a few minutes with the fire turned out. This test does not apply to sponge cake nor to angel food.

I am giving you one standard recipe. You may change this by adding spice or other flavorings.

Standard Layer Cake.

½ cup butter or other shortening
1 cup sugar
2 eggs
2 cups cake flour
3 teaspoons baking powder
¾ cup milk
1½ teaspoons vanilla

Cream the butter well and beat in the sugar gradually. Beat the egg yolks and stir into the creamed butter and sugar. Mix and sift the flour and baking powder together and add alternately with the milk, beating well with each addition. Beat the white of the eggs stiff and fold into the batter. Flavor and pour into layer cake pans. Bake in a moderate oven (375 degrees F.) 25 to 30 minutes. When cool, put chocolate frosting between and on top of the layers.

Boiled Frostings.

2 cups sugar
¾ cup water
3 egg whites

Boil the sugar and water until when tested it will hang from the spoon by a long thread (238 degrees F.). Pour it over the beaten whites. Beat well and place the bowl in hot water. Beat until fluffy. This frosting will not run.

Soft Chocolate Filling.

4 squares chocolate
1 cup sugar
¼ cup cold water
1½ cups milk
5 tablespoons flour
2 tablespoons cold water
2 tablespoons butter or other shortening
1 teaspoon vanilla

Cut chocolate into four or five pieces and put with water in saucepan. Stir over direct heat until smooth. Add sugar and milk and bring to the boiling point, stirring constantly. Mix flour with water and add slowly to the first mixture, stirring until thickened. Remove from the fire; add butter and vanilla. Cool and spread.

True Wealth

If I can live in simple comfort and owe no man, sharing intimately with loved ones life's varied experiences: if I can bring a touch of healing and a clearer outlook into the trials and problems of those with whom I mingle; if I can humbly undertake public service when the public calls me, caring neither too much nor too little for popular approval, if I can give spiritual values always first place and gladly sink from sight, like a bit of heaven, that others might be elevated — then will this experiment of living yield in full measure the true wealth of contentment and happiness.

Storms Just Passed Cost State $800,000 For Snow Plowing

It has cost the state highway department approximately $800,000 to keep its 11,000 mile trunk highway system open to traffic during the almost continuous storm condition of the past three and half weeks, according to an estimate made by N. W. Elsberg, state highway commissioner.

"With 400 state plows and 100 rented emergency trucks and tractors going day and night most of the time since late in January, the expense has been a severe strain on highway maintenance funds", Mr. Elsberg said.

"With the 500 units all in operation, the cost runs up to $2,000 an hour. Much of the time the plows have worked 20 hours a day. For every such day the cost is $40,000. These figures are based on an average total cost of $4 an hour per unit operated. The lighter trucks cost less than this, but the average is brought up by the heavy equipment and rotaries. The cost includes labor as well as machinery expense.

"Our snow fighting expense so far this winter is in the neighborhood of $1,000,000, which comes out of a total maintenance budget for the year of only $6,600,000. Our total snow expense last winter was about $900,000.

"If the highway department had not fought to keep the trunks open, drawing heavily on maintenence funds to do so, there undoubtedly would have been general disruption of business and economic life throughout the state and widespread suffering. Without open highways, the Twin Cities and other cities would have been cut off from milk supplies and the smaller towns would have run short of food and other necessities.

"This emergency illustrates the danger of cutting down highway revenues below levels which experience has taught us are safe. There must be a margin of funds over and above routine necessities to meet unpredictable emergencies such as winter storms and summer floods. Any serious crippling of the trunk system would mean famine for hundreds of thousands of persons if continued for more than a few days at a time.

"Even with all that was spent in the past month, there were still isolated cases in which communities did not get as good service from the highway department as we would like to have given them."

National F-L Party For 1936 Predicts Williams

"A national Farmer Labor party must be launched in 1936 rather than in 1940 is the decision of our national committee headed by Congressman Thomas R. Amlie of Wisconsin at its recent meeting in Washington, D. C.," declares Howard Y. Williams, national organizer of the Farmer Labor Political Federation, who has just returned to St. Paul from the meeting of the national committee and a month's organizing and speaking trip in eastern states.

"We believe that the policies of President Roosevelt will fail in the period of 1936-40. We must have a well organized Farmer Labor party on the national scene by 1940 to prevent black Republicanism from coming into power in 1940. That would mean fascism, for the Republicans would fail as completely as the Democrats are going to fail, because neither party has any program beyond liniment and bandages for the dying profit system. Only a new party committed to production for use rather than profit, the economy of abundance rather than scarcity, national social planning in place of rank competition and the gearing up of farms and factories to full production can meet this crisis. We must organize in the states and strike for victory in 1936.

"After an interview with Senator Gerald P. Nye of North Dakota, I am quite confident that he would accept the nomination for the presidency if he were drafted by a representative new party convention. Congressman Thomas R. Amlie of Wisconsin and Ernest Lundeen of Minnesota are possibilities for vice presidential candidates.

"The Farmer Labor party of Minnesota and the Progressive party of Wisconsin should take the lead in the calling of the national convention. Interviews with Norman Thomas and Louis Waldman of the Socialist party and other progressive leaders convince me that they would welcome such a move and cooperate fully in the campaign.

"We now plan the national convention for late June or early July. We believe that at least seven of the nine Congressmen in Minnesota can be elected on the Farmer Labor ticket and probably the full nine. With the two Senators that will give us a delegation of ten or eleven. In Wisconsin we can elect at least nine, and probably the full ten Congressmen on the third party ticket which with the Senator will give us ten or eleven there. We are convinced that we can increase the number over the country to at least thirty Congressmen. If the Guffey Coal Bill, the Wagner Labor Relations Bill and the Social Security Bill are declared unconstitutional and the administration make no determined fight for a Workers Rights Amendment to the Constitution, we may run the number up to seventy five congressmen and in an even race between Republicans and Democrats hold the balance of power in the next Congress.

"Minnesota, Wisconsin, Oregon, Washington, Oklahoma, at least 750,000 votes in California, are the states that should be carried in 1936 for the new party. Anything can happen by next November. We may win in 1936 and will certainly win in 1940.

"The rapid growth of sentiment for a new national party in the middle west and far west indicates that President Roosevelt can expect little or no support from liberals and radicals in those areas in the next election.

"In Oklahoma our Federation has won the endorsement of the powerful Veterans of Industry, representing 200,000 voters, and has the pledge of that group to independent political action in that state. Similar developments are constantly taking place throughout the country.

"The significance of this revolt against Roosevelt is that the people are demanding something more than the scarcity system the present Administration has attempted to preserve. They are demanding the right to a standard of living equal to the productive capacity of the country, and are unwilling to continue to support the organized sabotage of our productive efficiency."

Mr. Williams reports most encouraging meetings and conferences in the East with state parties in process of organization in Massachusetts, Vermont, New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, West Virginia and Kentucky.

Farm Bureau Seeks New Laws to Protect Prices

Presenting the case of the 100,939 Minnesota farmers whose production plans and economic status was upset by the adverse AAA decision, the Farm Bureau is working through its national office for immediate passage of new surplus control legislation. The Farm Bureau's Washington representative, Chester Gray, believes that the bill now in the legislative hopper, providing for adjusted production thru a soil conservation program, will meet the test of constitutionality and do the job the AAA was doing when it was outlawed by the high court. Federal grants to those practicing soil conservation will replace contract payments under the proposed new act.

Passage of new price-protecting legislation is doomed by the Farm Bureau to be of greatest importance of the eighteen projects upon which it is now actively engaged. Point 2 in its February program is its fight for retention by the government of the processing taxes now held in escrow. Holding that processors are not entitled to the money, the Farm Bureau urges that it be retained by the government and through legislative enactment assigned to agricultural purposes. Immediate payment of AAA contract obligations was demanded.

The Farm Bureau's views on these subjects also are held by the corn-hog and wheat committeemen of Minnesota, who at a meeting in St. Paul on Feb. 18 went on record urging the above points.

Other points on the Farm Bureau's current program seek continuance of the Wheeler amendment for at least 2 more years (3½ per cent on farm mortgages in F. C. A. with farmer control of F. C. A.) rural electrification program, farm to market roads, a managed currency, regulation of commodity exchanges, consumer protection against excessive industrial tariffs, reciprocal trade agreements providing for exchanging agricultural products for imported industrial goods, retention in U. S. department of agriculture of all agencies related to agriculture, farm tenant loans in F. C. A., soil erosion control and reforestation, adequate appropriations for vocation education, appropriation for next convention of International Farm Women of the World, food and drug amendments, neutrality and world peace, support of the constitution as set forth in annual resolutions.

Plaques to be Awarded In State Safety Work

Representatives of all city and county public safety committees will be invited to attend the dinner in the Hotel Lowry, St. Paul, April 14, when plaques are presented to the winners of the 1935 Minnesota traffic safety contest.

The award committee for the contest is headed by N. W. Elsberg, state highway commissioner, as chairman, according to an announcement by A. V. Rohweder of Duluth.

CAR RUNS OVER BOY, BUT HE DOESN'T MIND

Benson—Joe Hawkins, Benson high school student, can take it. Joe was leaving the high building recently with his coat collar pulled up high in an attempt to cut down the frigid blasts somewhat. As he stepped from the sidewalk into the street, an automobile driven by R. W. Richards came along from the west. Joe didn't see the car and was struck and run over by the rear left wheel, which passed over him just below the hips. The result was that Joe's pants were torn at one knee. When he returned to school for the afternoon classes he said it just "ached" a little.

HIGHWAY PATROL ADDS $169,291 TO STATE FUNDS

The Minnesota highway patrol was instrumental in adding $169,291 to the state revenues in 1935, according to the annual report of Chief John P. Arnoldy. Of this, $122,852 was collected in license corrections and $46,439 in fines. The patrol traveled 3,031,975 miles, by automobile and motorcycle, last year, the report reveals, and aided 1,088,502 motorists on the state's highways. Patrolmen warned 148,671 motorists of various minor traffic violations, tagged 33,475 for illegal equipment and 7,948 for operation with improper licenses and arrested 4,923.

WISCONSIN LABOR FIGHTS "LAW AND ORDER LEAGUE"

Milwaukee—"I do not recognize your organization as other than an unresponsible, anti-social, anti-labor, nefarious group capable only of destruction," was the way Henry Ohl, Jr., president of the Wisconsin Federation of Labor, characterized the Beaver Dam Law and Order League, which last week forced Earl Marks, vice-president, International Molder's Union, and Larry Cullen, national organizer for the molders, to leave town while being menaced by a mob.

Ohl went to Beaver Dam immediately after the occurance to confer with local labor officials. The state executive council of the federation is now voting by mail whether or not to transfer the state convention from Beaver Dam to some other city.

CONSUMERS' UNION OF U. S. APPLIES FOR N. Y. STATE CHARTER

New York.—The Consumers' Union of the United States, new non-profit organization to supply information on consumers' goods and services, has applied for a New York State corporation charter.

The organization was formed after Consumers' Reseach refused to grant demands of its striking employees. Directors of C. R. have so far refused to obey a decree of the New York National Labor Relations Board that it rehire three employees discharged for union activity.

The first bulletin of Consumers' Union, which will contain reports of research work and recommendations on consumers' goods will appear about March 15.

Twelve former employees of C. R. are already on the staff. Prof. Colston E. Warne of Amherst College heads the organization. Arthur Kallet, co-author of "100,000,000 Guinea Pigs," President; Heywood Broun of the American Newspaper guild, and Dewey Palmer, former chief technician at C. R., are directors. About 60 prominent liberals are sponsors.

CONSUMERS CLUB BUYS CO-OPERATIVELY

Nutley, N. J.—Members of the Nutley Consumers' Club reaped the first benefit of the cooperative buying movement last week when Allston Pulsford, club treasurer, distributed the first dividends. Altho the dividends total only about $15, the members believe the occasion marks a real start toward local consumer cooperation.

The club was founded last August by Mrs. John Dobbs of Nutley, now its secretary. The aim is to obtain lower prices on high grade commodities by special arrangement with local stores. The vendors agree to supply members with a particular product and to pay the club a commission for producing this business.

The goods are bought individually by members at the market price, but the vendor, at the end of a stated period, pays the club a commission on the sales. It is this commission which was distributed to the members Tuesday night in proportion to the amount of their purchases. The largest dividend will be about $3, but as products are added a considerable saving is expected in the buying of members.

Stockholders Had Meeting

The Stockholders and Patrons of the Farmers Cooperative Creamery Company here held their annual meeting at the Community Hall on Thursday of last week. The weather was terrible cold and stormy that day and kept most of the people at home. In spite of this about twenty-five stockholders and about sixty non-shareholder patrons braved the cold and came in for the meeting.

The annual report of the creamery was read and explained by Mr. Larson, manager of the institution. The creamery here enjoyed a fine increase in business in 1935 over that of 1934.

Mr. Larson stated that an increase of 53'000 pounds of butter fat was gained this year over the 1934 production.

In reading the annual report, Mr. Larson stated that the creamery had a net loss of $43.46 for the year. This was something that many of the patrons could not see through. The reason for this was that the creamery really made a profit of $546.00 but that is they declared this in their audit the farmers would have to pay out $77.00 of this for federal income tax. So instead of paying out the $77.00, the board of directors deemed it adviceable to declare a patronage dividend on the amount of butterfat purchased in 1935.

The dividend was set at ¼ cent per butterfat pound purchased and required $590.00. Therefore with a profit of $546.00 there would show a dificit of $43.46.

The same directors whose terms expire were reelected. They are: T. B. Folden, veteran member of the board, E. O. Waagedahl and F. D. Voth.

At their regular meeting on Monday the board of directors elected Mr. J. P. Augustine as president of the board and T. B. Folden as secretary.

Women More Vicious Than Men, Says J. Edgar Hoover

Take it from no less an authority than J. Edgar Hoover, director of the federal bureau of investigation, the female of the species is more deadly than the male. That is, women are more to be feared than men. Especially does this hold true where criminals are concerned. Women criminals, he asserts, excel in the will to kill. Statistics kept by the bureau of investigation reveal that the percentage of women charged with crimes of violence is greater than similar offenses charged to men. Although only 6.9 per cent of the persons arrested in the United States in October were women, these women showed a greater tendency toward murder than all the males arrested.—Pathfinder Magazine.

NO ALKALIES FOR ACID INDIGESTION

MILLIONS have found they do not need to drench their stomachs with strong, caustic alkalies. Physicians have said this habit often brings further acid indigestion. So much more safe and sensible to simply carry a roll of Tums in your pocket. Munch 3 or 4 after meals—or whenever troubled by heartburn, gas, sour stomach. Try them when you feel the effects of last night's party, or when you smoke too much. Tums contain a wonderful antacid which neutralizes acid in the stomach, but never over-alkalizes stomach or blood. As pleasant to eat as candy and only 10c at any drug store.

Rid Yourself of Kidney Poisons

DO you suffer burning, scanty or too frequent urination; backache, headache, dizziness, loss of energy, leg pains, swellings and puffiness under the eyes? Are you tired, nervous—feel all unstrung and don't know what is wrong?

Then give some thought to your kidneys. Be sure they function properly for functional kidney disorder permits excess waste to stay in the blood, and to poison and upset the whole system.

Use Doan's Pills. Doan's are for the kidneys only. They are recommended the world over. You can get the genuine, time-tested Doan's at any drug store.

No Need to Suffer "Morning Sickness"

"Morning sickness"—is caused by an acid condition. To avoid it, acid must be offset by alkalis—such as magnesia.

Why Physicians Recommend Milnesia Wafers

These mint-flavored, candy-like wafers are pure milk of magnesia in solid form—the most pleasant way to take it. Each wafer is approximately equal to a full adult dose of liquid milk of magnesia. Chewed thoroughly, then swallowed, they correct acidity in the mouth and throughout the digestive system and insure quick, complete elimination of the waste matters that cause gas, headaches, bloated feelings and a dozen other discomforts.

Milnesia Wafers come in bottles of 20 and 48, at 35c and 60c respectively, and in convenient tins for your handbag containing 12 at 20c. Each wafer is approximately one adult dose of milk of magnesia. All good drug stores sell and recommend them.

Washington Digest

National Topics Interpreted
By WILLIAM BRUCKART

NATIONAL PRESS BLDG. WASHINGTON, D. C.

Washington.—If ever there were a time other than when the nation was at war when money dominated the situation at Washington, it assuredly is now. One can go where he chooses about the government departments, to the White House or to Capitol Hill and the subject under discussion is or soon will be money.

Money Dominates

A year or so ago, we heard a great deal about money. We heard of it in connection with an appropriation of $4,880,000,000 — the greatest single peace-time voting of money in our history. And, likewise, we heard money discussed when the President used his power to devaluate the dollar in its relation to gold.

Now, however, the subject of money is discussed in a slightly different vein. The question that is paramount is how can the government get the money it needs. In other words, we are now getting around to the question of taxation, and it is a question that neither the President nor his lieutenants in congress like to face. It is an election year and a tax increase in election year is not what the politicians would call smoothing the highway of a campaign.

Passage of the legislation providing immediate payment of the veterans' bonus brought conditions to a head. The President vetoed the bonus bill and congress promptly overrode that veto. So the President promptly told congress that something had to be done about it; that the only funds the treasury could muster would be by borrowing and that since congress had yielded to the vocal minority represented by the greatest lobby ever to populate the Capitol, it thereby captured for itself a problem of raising the money.

Of course, the President must assume some responsibility even though he vetoed the bonus for the reason that some of the funds which must be raised will go to pay the crop control benefits or bonus resulting from invalidation of the processing taxes and the Agricultural Adjustment act. The President, as well as the political leaders in congress, want to continue that payment and they also want to pay farmers on commitments previously made because they regard them as moral obligation under the AAA contracts, Yet the country is likely to think in terms of the bonus for the war veterans and pay little attention to the smaller amount scheduled to go to the farmers and, indeed, the veterans' bonus is almost six times that which the administration desires to pay to the farmers.

"It's Up to Henry"

There was in this situation a development to which I believe attention should be called. Through many years congress has been an easy spender. Through the same years it has avoided at every turn laying taxes to offset the money it voted out of the treasury. Under the Roosevelt administration the peak of easy spending has been reached and congress has gone along with a vociferous "aye" on every spending proposal sent to the Capitol from the White House. The congressional attitude to which I have referred came up in bulk at the time of the bonus vote. Every time a bonus opponent inquired where the government would get the money to pay the two and one-half billion to the veterans, the answer from the bonus supporters was, in effect, "it's up to Henry."

I can recall a familiar slogan, current when I was a boy, that was used always when some one desired to shift responsibility—to pass the buck. It was "let George do it." In the bonus controversy, Senator Bankhead, Democrat of Alabama, was the first member of congress whom I heard say "it's up to Henry." He meant that the job of raising the money belonged to Henry Morgenthau, secretary of the treasury, but Senator Bankhead spoke more than his own feelings when he made the statement. He put into words a thought which permeated the minds of a vast majority of unthinking representatives and senators.

Perhaps I should not say unthinking because those men were, in truth, thinking very deeply. Their thoughts, instead of turning to song in the spring, were turning to votes in November. That was the reason for passage of the bonus. Senators and representatives seeking re-election were afraid to go into the battle for nomination and re-election this summer and have war veterans drag out the skeleton of a vote in opposition to immediate payment of the bonus.

It will be a long time before those who voted for the bonus can live it down. A keen political maneuver has something in it that calls for admiration but an obvious political maneuver such as was the passage of the bonus did not give any reason for commendation except, perhaps, the justification that if the Roosevelt administration was committed to passing out hundreds of millions of dollars on boondoggling and other more or less useless projects, then the war veterans were entitled to be paid now the sums which congress promised them would be paid in 1947. That really is a powerful argument but if Roosevelt supporters make that argument they are at the same time damning the New Deal spending policies, so I fancy that such an argument will be rarely advanced.

May Be No Tax Bill

It is entirely probable that there will be no tax bill this year unless the President's letter to Speaker Byrns pointing out the necessity for raising revenue causes an unheard of number of senators and representatives to do a flip-flop. No imagination is required to see that a representative or senator is in a tough spot when he goes back home asking the suffrage of his constituents and must tell them at the same time that he added to the tax burden which they must pay.

Well, if that be true, how is "Henry" going to get the money? It will have to be borrowed and it will have to be borrowed on government bonds which add up into an increasing government deficit. It means that instead of a deficit of around three billions in the next fiscal year, the treasury will be confronted with a deficit of more than five billions and the public debt, in the meantime, will have been correspondingly increased. It means, in addition, that the banks of the country will have to pile more government bonds on top of the government bonds they have thus far absorbed in financing a policy of spending our way out of the depression.

The tragedy of the situation in congress that brought about Senator Bankhead's remark of "it's up to Henry" is that it indicates that congress has been looking upon the treasury as a source of revenue. It is not and it never has been. Government is nonproductive. It can get funds only by taxation, by taking them away from the people—or by borrowing and if it borrows it has to pay back. In either event, new taxation must come and if congress doesn't have the nerve to pass tax legislation in this session, it must lay taxes in the next session.

Campaign Starts Early

The newspapers throughout the country have been full of reports concerning the early start of the political campaign. The Al Smith speech, coming from the man who made it, brought about a sudden expansion in the political fire. It really opened up the fight and henceforth we are due to be surfeited with this claim or that, this charge and that denial or countercharge, as the various leaders marshal their forces.

Thus far, in addition to President Roosevelt's Jackson day speech to the $50-a-plate diners and Mr. Smith's Liberty league dinner outburst, we have had active campaigning by former President Hoover, by Governor Talmadge of Georgia, by Senator Borah, the Idaho Republican; by Governor Landon, the Kansas Republican, and by Senator Robinson of Arkansas, the Democratic leader in the senate, who spoke in reply to Mr. Smith. Others are in the offing for the Republican and Democratic national committees are engaging radio times in a big way.

As speeches and statements increase in number, and as fanfare grows louder, I find myself getting a bit callous to them all. I have been wondering whether the American people have lost their sense of humor completely, because the situation really has a humorous side. Unless the people's sense of humor has been dreadfully seared, it seems to me they ought to be highly amused over ridiculous statements now being made on one side of the fence or on the other. Take, for instance, Mr. Roosevelt's handwritten bonus veto message. It presented something a bit unusual because in my time in Washington it had happened only once before that a President vetoed a bill with a handwritten message to congress. Of course, it was intended to be dramatic—and it was. But the point is this: A year ago when congress passed the bonus the President made a personal appearance in the halls of congress and read his own veto message. He made his vigorous fight and he rallied his supporters in line to sustain his veto. There has been so much talk around Washington since the handwritten message went to congress that the President really was not vigorously opposing passage of the bill over his veto that I am coming to believe that was true. In other words, he thought that immediate payment of the bonus was wrong but he had a weather eye out for the forthcoming campaign and the votes the bonus might bring.

Then consider the activity of Senator Borah. I believe the Idaho senator is too smart to feel that he can be the Republican nominee against Mr. Roosevelt, but he is going through all manner of gyrations just the same. He has purposes and objectives in mind, obviously, but they are not the Republican Presidential nomination as he leads his various audiences to infer It is to be recalled that Senator Borah has not at any time actually said he was a candidate. We have also the circumstance of Senator Robinson replying to Al Smith over the same radio and through substantially the same number of broadcasting stations.

And So the First Hunger Strike Was a Decided Flop

Without the least cynical intent, we would point out to you the story of one of the first hunger-strikers, published in the Golden Book Magazine.

"The Widow of Ephesus," relates Petronius, was a lady of so high repute for chastity that women came from neighboring lands to see and admire. When her husband died, she followed him to his tomb, determined to stay with him until she, too, should die of hunger. But it happened that a handsome young soldier was stationed nearby to guard three robbers who had been crucified, in order to prevent anyone removing their bodies and giving them burial. He discovered the widow, and believing it a great pity that anyone so beautiful should be allowed to perish, finally persuaded her to share his food. The soldier was neither ill-looking nor wanting in address, and says Petronius, "you all know what temptations assail poor human nature after a hearty meal." We leave you to finish the story for yourself.

Irish Sweepstakes Origin; Great Odds Against Winning

An act to permit a sweepstakes on British horse racing events was passed by the Irish Free State parliament in 1930, eight years after the Free State was established. The drawings are held three times a year in connection with the Grand National steeplechase in March, the derby in June and the Cambridgeshire stakes in October. From $12,000,000 to $18,000,000 is received for each drawing and of this amount about 62 per cent is returned in the form of prizes. The remainder goes to the Irish hospitals, the Irish government, and the organizers of the lottery.

While most of the publicity is directed at the enormous prizes received by American purchasers of tickets, it should be pointed out also that the odds have been figured out at about 400,000 to 1 against winning first prize and 250,000 to 1 against receiving any prize at all—Detroit News.

SYNOPSIS

The future of the youthful and comely "Widder" Marcia Howe is a conversational tit-bit among housewives of Wilton. Eligible bachelors and widowers also are interested. Marcia has as her guest her late husband's niece, Sylvia Hayden. A stranger, on the verge of exhaustion, finds his way to Marcia's home. Secretly, he asks her to hide a package containing jewelry. She does so. Elisha Winslow, town sheriff, brings news of a jewel robbery nearby. The stranger gives his name as Stanley Heath. Sylvia discovers the jewels, and naturally believes Heath is a robber. She realizes that Marcia must have hidden them, and decides to say nothing. Marcia feels she has altogether too deep an interest in her guest, but is powerless to overcome it. Heath wires "Mrs. S. C. Heath," New York, saying he is safe. He also orders a man named Currier to come at once. Sylvia, in her room, bedecks herself with the jewels. At Marcia's approach she hides them there. Heath asks Marcia to bring them to him. They are gone! He kindly makes light of the loss. Sylvia restores the jewels to their original hiding place. Elisha Winslow, visiting Marcia, discovers the gems and has no doubt they are the stolen gems, and that Heath is the thief, Leaving the jewels, he makes plans for arresting Heath.

Elisha's mounting disapproval changed to consternation.

Turning, he faced Eleazer.

"Say, Eleazer," he faltered, "s'pose we was to make a deal on this thing. S'pose, for the time bein' I was to take over your job an' you was to take over mine. S'pose you did the arrestin'? You seem to know a sight more 'bout how to manage it than I do.

"You put on the badge; you tell the thief to stick 'em up; you put the pistol 'twixt his shoulders, or wherever you think 'twill do the most good; an' you snap the handcuffs on him. I'll see you get full credit for it. Meanwhile, if there's a fire or an undertakin' job, I'll manage 'em somehow."

Eleazer shook his head.

"That wouldn't do, 'Lish, no way in the world," he objected. "We can't go swappin' offices voted us by the town. Folks wouldn't like it. Was I, a common citizen, to shoot the criminal, I'd likely be hauled up for murder. I'm willin' to stand by you to the extent of goin' along an' keepin' you company; but you must be the one that bears the brunt of the job. You ain't told me yet none of the details of this business. If I'm goin' to help you, I'd oughter be told everything about it. Who is the criminal? An' where is he? An' how'd you come to get track of him?"

Alas, the questions were the very ones Elisha had hoped to escape answering. Nevertheless, he knew of no way to evade his confederate's curiosity.

Reluctantly, cautiously, he poured out his story and was rewarded to see the other town official gape at him, open-mouthed.

"Bless my soul," he reiterated. "Bless my soul! Who would 'a' drempt it?" he burst out when he could contain himself no longer. "Wal, I never did like that feller Heath. I suspected from the first there was somethin' wrong about him. Prob'ly he has queer eyes. You can always spot a criminal by his eye. Kinder shifty an' fishy. I understand human nature. This Heath feller, now. I understand him."

"Then p'raps you can foretell what he's likely to do when I arrest him," put in Elisha eagerly.

"I can," Eleazer nodded. "I can prophesy just about what he'll do."

"What?"

"It's better I shouldn't tell you. 'Twouldn't be wise. We must do our duty no matter what comes of it."

Elisha's knees weakened beneath him.

"Seems to me," went on Eleazer, "that 'stead of loiterin' here discussin' the calamities of the future you'd better be gettin' on to your house. You've got to put on your other clothes. The press, most likely, will want to photograph you. Then you must hunt up your badge, your handcuffs an' all your paraphernalia. I'd better cut across the field, meantime, an' oil up my pistol. Mebbe I can fix it so-st it'll go off. I'll try an' find you some cartridges, too. I wouldn't want to stand by an' see you struck down without your havin' some slight defense, poor as 'tis."

With this dubious farewell, Eleazer bustled off across the dingle and was lost to sight.

Going to the closet, he took out his Sunday suit, shook it, and with the air of one making ready his shroud, spread it upon the bed.

Next he produced a boiled shirt, a collar, and a black tie.

It took him some time to assemble these infrequently used accessories, and he was dismayed to find no collar-button.

A collar-button was the corner-stone of his toilet—the object on which everything else depended. Should it fail to be forthcoming, the game was up. He could not administer the law without it.

Perhaps, viewing the matter from every angle, its disappearance was a fortunate, rather than an unfortunate, omen.

To grapple with an experienced criminal was suicidal. Suppose the criminal did escape? Were not lawbreakers doing so every day?

But, alas, there was Eleazer to whom he had confided the entire story!

No, there was no possibility of his backing out of the affair now and washing his hands of it. He must go through with it.

He went downstairs to hunt up his badge and handcuffs. These he kept in the drawer of the tall secretary in the sitting room. To his consternation, the drawer was empty!

And not only was it empty but it had been left open as if a marauder possessed of sticky hands had hastily abandoned it.

Unwilling to believe the articles were gone, Elisha peered feverishly into every corner the piece of furniture contained. But beyond a thick coating of dust, nothing rewarded his search.

At length, as a last resort, he reluctantly shouted for May Ellen.

"Wal, sir?"

"May Ellen, who's been explorin' this secretary of mine? Some of the things that oughter be in it, ain't," blustered he. "My handcuffs an' sheriff's badge."

"Mercy on us! You don't tell me a crime's been committed in Wilton! I guess it's the first time in all the town's history. Won't folks be agog? It'll stir up the whole community."

"You mustn't peep about this outside, May Ellen," Elisha cautioned. "Was you to, no end of harm might be done. The criminal, you see, is still at large an' we want to trap him 'fore he suspects we're after him. Now 'bout the badge an' handcuffs. You see how important 'tis I should have 'em. They was in the drawer an' the whole place is messed up an' sticky as if some person who had no business meddlin' had overhauled it."

"It's that miserable Tommy Cahoon!" interrupted May Ellen. "His mother left him an' Willie here with me a week ago when she went to Sawyer Falls shoppin'. The little monkeys must 'a' sneaked indoors when I wasn't lookin' an' took that an' the handcuffs. I'm dretful sorry. Last I saw of the imps they was out yonder under the apple trees. S'pose we have a look there."

Almost beside himself with an indignation he dared not voice, Elisha followed May Ellen out of doors.

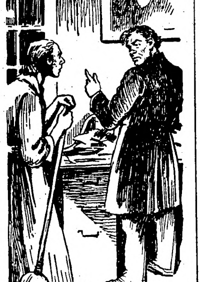
Yes, trampled into the sodden ground lay the badge. There, too, lay the handcuffs, tightly snapped together and without a trace of a key to unlock them.

Elisha dubiously eyed the muddy objects. Well, at least, thought he, everything was not lost. He had gained time.

To wear his badge until a new pin was soldered to it was out of the question. In addition, the handcuffs were of no use at all unless a key could be found to unlock them.

As he turned to re-enter the house, Eleazer hailed him.

"I've had the devil of a time with this revolver," announced he, puffing into the yard and jauntily flourishing the weapon. Then regarding his comrade's greenish countenance, he remarked abruptly, "Say, what's the matter with you, 'Lish?"



"You Mustn't Peep About This Outside, May Ellen."

Elisha told his story.

"Wal, if that ain't the ole Harry!" fumed Eleazer. "That's goin' to ball us all up. There's no use doin' this thing if it ain't done in bang-up style. We got to get that badge soldered an' them handcuffs unlocked 'fore another move can be made. I s'pose mebbe Nate Harlow over to Belleport could help us out."

"An' go blabbin' all over town the predicament the Wilton sheriff was in? No—sir—ee! Not if I know it. The only thing to do is to motor to Sawyer Falls an' hunt up Pete McGrath, the blacksmith. He's a wizard with tools. I never knew no job to stump him yet. He'll know what to do."

Accordingly the two men set forth on their errand.

They rode in uncomfortable silence until the white spire of the Sawyer Falls church appeared and, rounding the bend of the road, the car rolled into the town.

Around its shabby railroad station clustered a group of motor cars, a truck or two, and the usual knot of loitering men and boys.

The small shed where the forge stood was close by the tracks and as he pulled up before it, Elisha espied through its doorway not only Peter McGrath, the blacksmith, but also the rotund figure of Artie Nickerson, the Sawyer Falls station agent.

"Art's inside! Ain't that luck?" he remarked, clambering out of the car.

They went in and after the usual greetings, Elisha stated his errand.

McGrath took the handcuffs and badge to the light and examined them.

"Humph! Looks as if you'd been in some sort of a scrimmage," he commented. "But I'll start on 'em straight away. I ain't busy on nothin' that can't be put aside."

Elisha and Eleazer strolled over to a box and sat down to wait.

"How are you, Art?" Elisha inquired. "Didn't you have a nephew or a cousin 'sociated with a police force somewheres?"

"Bennie, you mean? Oh yes. He's a policeman out in Chicago. Just now he's laid up in the hospital, but he 'spects to be out again 'fore long. Got shot through the arm a couple of weeks ago. Winged by a stray bullet while chasin' up a guy that had broke into a store. The shrimp hit him. Luckily he didn't kill him. Ben thought he got off pretty easy."

Elisha's smile faded.

"These fellers that's at large now don't give a hang who they murder," went on the station agent affably. "They're a desperate crew. They'd as soon kill you as not. Bennie landed his man, though. He's done great work on the force. Been shot three or four times while on duty. 'Tain't a callin' I myself would choose, but he seems to get a big kick out of it."

Elisha, pale to the lips, suddenly decided he had heard enough of Bennie and shifted the subject.

"S'pose you're still goin' round in the same ole treadmill over at the station, Art," he observed.

"Yep. Same ole rut. I've had, though, a bit more telegraphin' to do of late than formerly. Know a feller over to Wilton named Heath? He's sent off several wires."

Both Elisha and Eleazer straightened up.

"Heath. Yes, indeed. He's stoppin' in town for a while."

"So I gathered. Lives in New York at one of them big hotels. He sent a wire to his wife. Leastways, I figger 'twas his wife. He signed himself 'Lovingly, Stanley,' an' addressed it to Mrs. Stanley Heath."

"You don't say! That's news to me," Elisha cried. He darted a glance at Eleazer.

Artie, gratified at seeing he had created a sensation, beamed broadly.

"'Course I ain't permitted to divulge messages that go through my hands. They're confidential. But for that I could tell you somethin' that would make your eyes pop outer their sockets."

"Somethin' about Heath?"

"Somethin' he said in a telegram."

Elisha had an inspiration.

"S'pose I was to ask you officially?" he suggested. "S'pose it's important for me to know what was in that message? S'pose I demanded you tell me in the name of the law? I'm askin' you as sheriff of the town of Wilton."

"Oh, that's different. The wire was just sent to a friend. The part that astonished me was its beginnin'. It ran somethin' like this:

"'Safe on Cape with my lady. Shall return with her later.'"

"What interested me," droned Artie, "was who this lady could be. Heath, apparently, is a married man. What business has he taggin' after some Wilton woman an' totin' her back to New York with him when he goes?"

"He ain't got no business doin' it," Eleazer shouted. "He's a blackguard—that's what he is! But don't you worry, Artie. He ain't goin' to put no such scurvy trick over on any Wilton woman. Me an' 'Lish'll see to that. How much more tinkerin' have you got to do on them trinkets, Pete? The sheriff an' me is in a hurry to get home."

"You'll have to give me a good half hour more."

"That'll mean we won't fetch up at Wilton 'til after dark," Eleazer fretted.

"There's no use goin' up in the air an' rilin' Pete all up, Eleazer," Elisha intervened. "We'll just have to be patient an' put off what we was plannin' to do until tommorow. I reckon mornin'll be a better time, anyway. Certainly 'twill do just as well."

"Mebbe," Eleazer grumbled. "Still, I'm disappointed. Wal, that bein' the case, s'pose you an' me step over to the drug store while we're hangin' round an' do them errands we mentioned."

Elisha agreed.

A faint flush had crept back into his cheeks and his eyes had regained their light of hope.

He had wrested from Fate another twelve hours of life, and life was sweet.

The House of Rothschild

The House of Rothschild was governed in its business activities by two well-defined policies. The first was the determination of the five brothers to conduct the whole of their business in constant co-operation, thus carrying out the dying command of their father. The second was never to strain after excessive profit and, as far as human foresight could achieve it, to leave nothing to chance. Their watchword was: "Be moderate and never lose sight of the goal."

Happiest Age to Marry Is 33 for Man, 27 for Bride

Contrary to a common idea, early marriages are allegedly not the happiest, at least for the American populations. A new chart showing the ages at which men and women should marry if they are to have the greatest chance of happiness has been prepared by Dr. Hornell Hart, professor of social ethics at the Hartford Theological seminary. According to this chart the ages at which the chance of marital happiness is mathematically greatest are thirty-three for the man and twenty-seven for the bride.

However, the chart shows a range of greatest chance of married happiness corresponding to groom's ages between twenty-nine and thirty-seven and the bride's ages between twenty-three and thirty-one. — Pathfinder Magazine.

Playful Elephants Annoy Farmers of S. W. Africa

Efforts are being made by farmers in the Outjo district of South West Africa to obtain some relief from the administration from a plague of elephants. Elephants, being "Royal game," cannot be shot, and the Outjo farmer who sees his fences, windmills and reservoirs being destroyed by them has simply to look on. This, however, is not the only complaint, for now the elephants have taken to chasing the farmers off their own farms.

On several recent occasions farmers, while inspecting their properties, have been chased by elephant herds. Each time, however, the farmers have been lucky enough to be mounted and have managed to make good their escape, but they have become so annoyed that they are now petitioning to be allowed to shoot the raiders.—Montreal Herald.

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN, The Safety Man

I firmly believe that most of the driving weaknesses can be corrected if recognized by the driver. The trouble with most of us is that we do not want to recognize our own faults. On the other hand, we are always ready to mention the faults of the driver ahead of us.

Here are some of the common mistakes that can be corrected:

1. Drive within your limitation. You may have your car under control at 40 miles an hour but not at 60.
2. If you are color blind, watch others at stop lights.
3. If you cannot judge distance, do not take a chance in passing.
4. If you are not sure of the meaning of a sign ask about it. Safe drivers ask many questions.
5. If you get nervous, keep out of congested areas.

If some of these faults are yours, please try to correct them.

We agree with the judge who ruled that a wooden leg does not bar a man from operating an automobile. It's wooden heads that cause most of the trouble.

Scouts Hold Court of Honor

The local Boy Scout Troop No. 112 had a Court of Honor at the basement of the Nazareth Lutheran Church last Thursday evening.

All the business men of the town and fathers of the boys were there to attend the doing. The boys were examined on the passing of several tests.

Several of the business men gave short talks on the scout work and Hartley Peterson, Scoutmaster, gave a brief outline of the work the boys have been doing this winter.

The scout troop here is backed by the Holt Commercial Club. Sam Lorentson read the questions to the boys at the Court of Honor, after which all were treated to a bounteous lunch by the Commercial Club.

The Boy Scouts is a fine organization and the local troop a fine bunch of boys who merits the support of their fathers. Let us all boost for the Boy Scouts and keep the work going as well as it has been so far.

Cooperatives In 1935

A report by the Farm Credit Administration shows that the agricultural cooperative marketing movement made substantial progress in 1935 — as it has in almost every year since its inception.

Almost 8,000 associations engaged in marketing farm commodities during the year. They had a total membership of 2,490,000 farmers, and did a total volume of business of $1,342,000,000 a gain of 14.5 percent over 1934.

The largest number of cooperatives was in the North Central States. On the basis of business transacted, dairy products constituted the most important commodity marketed by co-ops, followed in order by grain, fruits and vegetables livestock, cotton, products, and poultry and products.

2500 Attend Short Course at Warren

Approximately 2,500 attended the two-day thirteenth annual short course sponsored at Warren last week by the Farmers Federation of Clubs.

Blocked roads cut the attendance considerably, R. A. Rierson, general chairman said, but good crowds were on hand for all sessions.

Speakers in the men's department included John Brandt, president of the Land O'Lakes Creameries, T. M. McCall of the Northwest school at Crookston, Ray Bowden, secretary of the Northwest Country Elevator association and W. W. Brookings of the University of Minnesota extension department.

In the women's department Retta Bede of the Northwest school was a speaker and Mrs. J. H. Rosendahl presided. Music was supplied for various meetings by the Warren high school band under the direction of K. Killand and the Alvarado school band directed by O. K. Warcup.

TAXLESS IOWA TOWN PAYS ITS WAY WITH MUNICIPAL UTILITIES

Hawarden, Ia.—For the fifth consecutive year this town will levy no local taxes this year, according to a report to State Comptroller C. B. Murtagh.

Proposed expenditures of $68,000 will be met largely from the revenues of municipally-owned utilities, the town officials report.

The last tax levied for town purposes was in 1930, when $6,000, or about one-tenth of that year's expenditures, was raised by taxation.

VIRGINIA DEDICATES NEW MUNICIPAL HOSPITAL

Virginia, Minn.—This Range iron mining town of 16,000 people dedicated a $250,000 municipal hospital on Feb. 1, adding hospitalization to the many services now owned and run by the community in the interest of service, not profit. Virginia already operates its own utilities, having one of the lowest electric rates in the nation and heats the homes of its citizens with a municipal central heating plant.

The hospital has 50 beds and is completely equipped in every detail. To raise the money for the building, the citizens voted to bond the city up to $200,000. In addition the federal government gave $69,354.

A special election will be held to choose a board to run the hospital.

Newspapers Lead Field As Advertising Media

Fourteen reasons were pointed out this week to show why newspapers continued as "tops" as advertising media during 1935. Simultaneously with the announcement that newspaper advertising showed large gains during the last year, Thomas F. Barnhart, associate professor of journalism at the University of Minnesota, reported that a survey of media showed the following advantages of newspaper advertising.

1. Newspaper reading is a universal habit. Newspaper advertising, therefore, reaches virtually all who read and buy.
2. A newspaper advertisement can always be seen by the reader.
3. The newspaper advertisement, as part of the complete paper, goes into the home as a welcome guest.
4. The newspaper advertisement can have as much news value and reader interest as the news item.
5. The amount of text used in newspaper advertisements is dependent only upon the size of the space.
6. Newspaper advertising is flexible.
7. Newspaper advertising is quickly controlled.
8. Newspaper advertising may be adjusted to different conditions.
9. Newspaper advertising enables manufacturers and dealers to state where their products may be bought.
10. Newspaper advertising is inexpensive. Merchants have learned that it covers more families for less money than any other form of advertising.
11. Newspaper advertising results may be checked.
12. Newspaper circulation is known and is comparatively unaffected by daily change.
13. Nearly all of the newspaper's circulation is concentrated in its own market.
14. Newspaper advertising reduces selling costs because it entails no waste in circulation. This helps reduce costs for the consumer.

"Newspaper advertising", he concluded, "builds confidence and good will, attracts new customers, increases sales, and stabilizes merchandise, methods and prices.

Forestry Divison Exams Announced

An examination for towerman, smoke chasers, and patrolmen for the division of forestry will be given on March 2, 1936, according to Grover M. Conzet, director. The examinations will take place in room 338 State Office Building, St. Paul, and at all of the District Rangers' headquarters.

Men taking the examination must be between 21 and 50 years of age. Not more than 16 men may be employed throughout the state. Such employment will be of a temporary nature.

Spurt Marks Spring Loans for Farming

Production Credit Associations of Minnesota in the first month of 1936 have made loans to one-third more farmer members than in the first month of 1935, according to figures from the production credit corporation, for this state.

Up to the end of January 680 farmers had obtained loans thru the 26 associations in Minnesota as against 457 a year ago, a gain of 223. The amount borrowed this year from their associations by the members is $406,000, which is $192,000 more than was borrowed in the first month of last year.

Much of the 1936 borrowing is in anticipation of 1936 crop production, though some of it is for the purpose of taking care of previous debts owed for farming expenses, and some for the purchase of livestock, materials and equipment.

Association officers are prepared for an increasing volume of business as the weather opens up to permit outside work, application blanks and other data being now available at the homes of local representatives in many rural communities in addition to the headquarters offices.

Highway Expenditures Bring Wide Benefits

A highway expenditure of $100,000,000 initiates a movement that eventually involves, in the handling and processing of materials by industry, a total value of business transacted of approximately $315,000,000. This is the conclusion reached by the U. S. Bureau of Public Roads after an extensive study of highway construction as an employment measure during depression.

A report on this study, recently published, shows that an annual highway expenditure of $100,000,000 results in an average annual employment on the highway work and in industry equivalent to 102,690 persons continuously employed for twelve months. Of these 37,960 are directly employed in highway work and 64,730 indirectly employed in industries furnishing materials, equipment, supplies and services.

"In addition to affording economic and unemployment relief", the Bureau states, "highway construction eventually provides a connected highway system which is a distinct national asset, promoting agricultural and industrial expansion and fostering social values."

Hunters Urged to File Game Reports

Hunters are again urged to send their 1935 game license reports to the division of game and fish as soon as possible. The license cards are already addressed to the game and fish division. All that is necessary is to make out the report of game taken and stamp and mail the cards.

"In 1925, the first year the reports were made mandatory, there were 131,590 small game licenses issued and the percentage reporting was 56.2." A. C. Hanson, director of the division, pointed out.

"In 1933 there were 215,729 licenses issued, with a percentage of only 23.2 reporting. It has been noted that the percentage has consistently decreased each year, with but one exception. It is important that we obtain as many reports as possible as there is no better way to learn of actual game conditions."

Bloodhounds as Trailers

"Females, as a rule, make the best trailers. They have more life, are very ambitious and intelligent and are the easiest to train. The male, as a rule, has more courage and is seldom shy in locating the person being pursued if that person conceals himself in a building or crowd. Further, he quite often attacks if the trailed person attempts to escape after being located," asserts a trainer in the Washington Star.

A home-town newspaper always stands for the good things in any community. No worth-while movement succeeds without the newspaper's support. A worthwhile newspaper can accomplish much good and usually does, but seldom does an individual appreciate it. SYNOPSIS

The youthful and comely "Widder" Marcia Howe has as her guest her late husband's niece, Sylvia Hayden. A stranger, on the verge of exhaustion, finds his way to Marcia's home. Secretly, he asks her to hide a package containing jewelry. She does so. Elisha Winslow, town sheriff, brings news of a jewel robbery nearby. The stranger gives his name as Stanley Heath. Sylvia discovers the jewels, and naturally believes Heath is a robber. She realizes that Marcia must have hidden them, and decides to say nothing. Marcia feels she has altogether too deep an interest in her guest, but is powerless to overcome it. Heath wires "Mrs. S. C. Heath," New York, saying he is safe. He also orders a man named Currier to come at once. Sylvia, in her room, bedecks herself with the jewels. At Marcia's approach she hides them there. Heath asks Marcia to bring them to him. They are gone! He kindly makes light of the loss. Sylvia restores the jewels to their original hiding place. Elisha Winslow, visiting Marcia, discovers the gems and has no doubt they are the stolen gems, and that Heath is the thief. Leaving the jewels, he makes plans for arresting Heath.

CHAPTER VII

—10—

Dawn was breaking over Wilton when a trim motor car, bearing a New York number plate, slipped quietly into the village and drew up at the town garage.

From it stepped a man, small and somewhat bent. "May I leave my car here?" he inquired of the lad who was sweeping out the building.

"Sure!"

"Fill her up for me, please. And you might clean her a bit."

"Been riding all night?"

The stranger nodded.

"I like traveling at night," he volunteered. "Less traffic. Can you tell me where a Mr. Heath is staying?"

"Heath? The chap who ran aground on the Crocker Cove sand bar? He's over to The Widder's."

"Where's that?"

"How does one get there?"

"Wal, the only way to reach the house when the tide's full, as 'tis now, is to row."

"Where'll I find a boat?"

"That I couldn't say. The Widder keeps hers t'other side of the channel. Mebbe, though, if you was to go down to the beach some fisherman would give you a lift across. 'Most any of 'em would admire to if you're a friend of Marcia Howe's."

The stranger bowed but offered no comment. If curiosity stirred within him concerning the information the lad vouchsafed, at least he gave no sign.

"Thank you," he replied briefly. "Will this road take me to the beach?"

"Straight as an arrow."

Without wasting additional words or time, the stranger nodded and started off briskly in the direction indicated. When he reached the beach he halted, scanning eagerly the silvered house beyond the channel. Discovering no one in sight, he dragged from the shore a yellow dory, clambered into it, and catching up the oars began to row toward the dwelling silhouetted against the water and the glory of the morning sky.

* * * * * * *

In the meantime, both Marcia and Sylvia had wakened early and were astir.

The kitchen fire was already snapping merrily in the stove, however, and the table was spread before the latter made her appearance.

She came in, carrying a thick envelope.

"Why, Sylvia, how you startled me!" Marcia exclaimed. "I did not hear you come down stairs. Why are you up so early?"

"I'm going to town to catch the morning mail. I have to get off this letter."

"Have to?"

"Yes—to Hortie. You see, if I didn't answer promptly he might think the candy had gone astray," explained the girl.

"Oh, of course, you must thank him for the candy," Marcia agreed. "Still, is it necessary to do so in such a rush—to walk to the village this morning?"

"I mean to row over."

"I'm afraid you can't, dear. I discovered last night the boat was gone. Eleazer Crocker must have appropriated it when he was here yesterday. I shall give him a good lecture when I see him. It is a serious thing to be letf out here with no way of getting to land. In fact, here we are with this tremendously important letter that must be posted immediately—willy-nilly."

With eyes brimming with laughter, Marcia shot a mischievous glance at her companion.

"But it is only the last of April, beloved."

"Men need to know such things well in advance. They have to adjust their business."

"I see," smiled Marcia. "Under such conditions, I suppose the sooner the letter is sent the better."

"It isn't just to thank Hortie for the candy that I'm writing," that young lady replied sedately. "You see, he asked if he might come to Wilton for his summer vacation. He has to know so he can make his plans."

"The sooner I start, the sooner I shall be back, I suppose," Sylvia answered with feigned reluctance. "Men are so unreasonable. Any errands?"

"Not today, thanks. Just the mail."

"I'll wait for it."

As the door closed behind her, Marcia smiled whimsically.

She prepared Heath's breakfast tray, and was about to take it upstairs when there was a gentle knock at the kitchen door.

A stranger stood upon the threshold.

"Is Mr. Stanley Heath staying here?" inquired he.

"Yes."

"I am Currier. Mr. Heath sent for me."

"Of course! Come in, won't you? Mr. Heath is expecting you. I'll tell him you are here."

"You needn't do that, madam. If you will just show me where he is—"

"At the head of the stairs."

"Very good. Thank you, madam. I will go up."

Marcia soon heard the invalid's voice, imperative and eager, each sentence ending with an interrogation. The lapses of silence which intervened and which at first she took to be pauses, she presently decided represented the inaudible and subdued replies of Currier.

To judge from the sounds, Heath was pouring out an avalanche of questions. Once he broke into peals of hearty laughter, followed by a paroxysm of coughing.

"He has forgotten all about breakfast," murmured Marcia. "I'll carry it up."

She mounted the stairs softly that her coming might break in as little as possible upon the conversation of her two guests.

"She was alone in the library when I went in," Heath was saying, "and turned so white I feared she might faint or scream. Luckily she did neither.

"'You know what I'm after,' I said—'the jewels. Come, hand them over.' "At that, she began to cry.

"'Quickly,' I repeated. 'Someone may come.'

"With that, she produced the jewel case, pouring out a torrent of explanations.

"I stopped no longer than I had to, I assure you. In no time I had made my getaway. Every detail of my plan would have gone smoothly but for the fog. I lost my bearings completely. Imagine my amazement at finding myself here."

Marcia waited to hear no more.

So Heath really had taken the jewels from the resisting woman who owned them—taken them against her will and made off with them!

He owned it!

Nay, more! Far from regretting what he had done, in his tone rang a note of satisfaction in his accomplishment.

She had never believed him guilty. Not until she heard the bitter, irrevocable confession from his own lips did she waver, and even then she battled against the truth, refusing to be convinced. There must be some explanation, she told herself. Nevertheless, the shock was overwhelming.

Her head swam. Her heart beat wildly.

"I must not give way!" she reiterated to herself. "I must put on a brave front. He must not suspect I know."

It took a few moments for her to regain her grip on herself, to drag back her ebbing strength.

Then she knocked at the door.

"Here is your coffee, Mr. Heath," she called.

"Come in, Mrs. Howe. I'm afraid we've delayed you. I had entirely forgotten about breakfast and so, I'll be bound, had Currier. You met my right-hand man down stairs, I take it."

"You found the house without trouble?" Marcia inquired, making an effort to address the newcomer in a natural, off-hand manner.

"Yes, Mrs. Howe. A young man at the garage directed me."

As Marcia turned to go, her unfailing courtesy prompted her to say:

"Mr. Currier is welcome to stay if he wishes to, Mr. Heath. We can put him up perfectly well."

"Oh, no. He is returning directly. Nevertheless, I greatly appreciate your kindness."

"Mrs. Heath is anxious," put in Currier. "She begged me to come home as soon as possible that she might know how Mr. Heath was. Naturally she has been much worried."

"There, there, Currier—that will do," broke in Stanley Heath, flushing. "And now, since Mrs. Howe is here and is in our secret, I may as well tell you that part of the mission on which you came cannot be accomplished. You cannot take the gems back with you to New York. A calamity has befallen them."

"A calamity, sir?"

"Mrs. Howe helped me conceal the jewels downstairs in a hiding place under the kitchen floor," continued Stanley Heath. "When she went to get them they were gone."

"It is all very mysterious," broke in Marcia, taking up the tale. "I cannot in any way account for their disappearance and am much distressed."

"Have you any theory as to who could have taken them?" inquired Currier.

"Absolutely none. I cannot even see how anybody had the chance to take them. No one knew they were there."

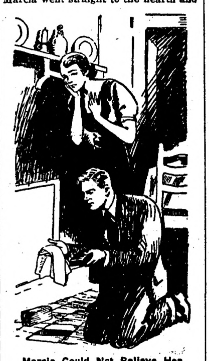
"Would you be willing to show me where they were hidden and allow me to investigate?"

"Certainly. I'll take you downstairs now, while we have the opportunity. When do you start back?"

"That is for Mr. Heath to decide."

"Right off. As soon as you can get under way," Stanley Heath said decisively. "Go down now with Mrs. Howe, since she is so gracious, and have your breakfast. Examine, too, the place where we concealed the jewel case. You may discover a clew she has missed."

Preceding Currier into the kitchen, Marcia went straight to the hearth and pointed to the brick at her feet.



Marcia Could Not Believe Her Eyes.

"It was here we put the jewel case," she said.

"I think, with your permission, I will take up the brick," the little man at her elbow quietly announced.

"Certainly," acquiesced Marcia.

Beneath it lay the jewel case, wrapped as before in Stanley Heath's monogrammed handkerchief.

Marcia could not believe her eyes.

"But—but—it wasn't there when I looked. I could swear it wasn't."

"Who could have taken it out? And if some one did why return anything so valuable?" Currier inquired.

"I don't know. I do not understand it at all," the woman replied. "There is something uncanny about the whole affair."

"Well, at any rate, the gems are here now," said Currier in a matter-of-fact tone. "Mr. Heath will be much relieved. Shall I go up and—"

"As you prefer, madam."

Off flew Marcia.

Her haste, the radiance of her face must have suggested to the stranger a thought that had not occurred to him before, for after she had gone, he stood immovable in the middle of the floor looking after her.

Then a slow, shadowy smile passed across his features.

"So—ho!" he muttered. "So—ho!"

He was still absorbed in reverie when Marcia, breathless and flushed, rejoined him.

"I can think of nothing but the jewels and their recovery. I am so happy I had completely forgotten your breakfast. You might run up to see Mr. Heath while I am getting it ready."

"I will do that. I shall be leaving at once and he may have final orders for me, or perhaps a letter for Mrs. Heath."

"Mrs. Heath!" Marcia repeated, as if the name suddenly brought before her consciousness something hitherto forgotten. "Yes, yes! Of course."

Then turning her head aside, she inquired with studied carelessness:

"How long, I wonder, does Mr. Heath plan to remain in Wilton? I think that as soon as he is able to make the journey he would better go home. This climate is—is—damp and he will, perhaps, pick up faster away from the sea. If you have any influence with him, won't you please advise it?"

The man's small, gray eyes narrowed.

"I have no influence with Mr. Heath," replied he. "Mrs. Heath has, however. Shall I tell her?"

"I wish you would."

* * * * * * *

An hour later My Unknown Lady weighed anchor and disappeared out to sea, carrying with her Currier and the jewels.

Marcia watched until the last snowy ripple foaming in her wake had disappeared, then she sank into a chair and brushed her hand across her eyes.

"And that's the end of that foolishness!" she muttered. "The end!"

Rodents and Civilization

Small wild animals have found civilization a distinct advantage, says Pathfinder Magazine. In primitive regions the numbers of such animals as ground squirrels, gophers, prairie dogs and the like are largely determined by the available food supply and the extent to which they are the prey of larger animals. As farmers settled the West the larger animals were driven off and crops were planted lessening dangers and increasing the food supply of the small rodent. As a result they multiplied quickly and now it is necessary to trap and poison the rodent pests in order to effectively control their numbers.

Ground Grip
The tire that makes its own road
With Firestone Ground Grip Tires on your truck you can go through snow, mud, sand, gravel or over unimproved roads. You save the cost and bother of chains
On your car, Firestone Ground Grip Tires will enable you to go through—road or no road, regardless of weather
Ground Grip Tires on farm implements reduce shocks and vibration; you save on repair bills
On your tractor, Firestone Ground Grip Tires will save you time and fuel and give you more drawbar pull

FARMERS everywhere are enthusiastic in their praises of the Firestone Ground Grip Tire — they say it's the greatest traction tire ever built, and so economical. How was it possible for Firestone to build such a remarkable tire? Firestone patented construction features are the answer. Gum-Dipping, a process that soaks every cotton fiber in every cord with pure liquid rubber, prevents internal friction and heat and gives the cord body greater strength to withstand the stresses and strains of heavy pulling at low air pressures.

The patented feature of two extra layers of Gum-Dipped cords under the tread locks the massive super traction tread securely to the body of the tire. This patented Ground Grip tread is made wider, heavier and deeper, with scientific spacing between the bars so that the tire is self-cleaning, yet rides smoothly on improved roads. These patented construction features are used only in Firestone Tires. This is why you get greatest traction, longest life and outstanding performance in Ground Grip Tires. They are the best investment a farmer can make.

Equip your car, truck, tractor and farm implements with new Firestone Ground Grip Tires and save yourself time, money and hard work. See this remarkable tire at your nearby Firestone Auto Supply and Service Store, at your Tire Dealer, or at your Implement Dealer. Remember, when buying farm equipment specify Firestone Ground Grip Tires for greatest efficiency and economy.

I'M SOLD

It always works

Just do what hospitals do, and the doctors insist on. Use a good liquid laxative, and aid Nature to restore clocklike regularity without strain or ill effect.

A liquid can always be taken in gradually reduced doses. Reduced dosage is the real secret of relief from constipation.

Ask a doctor about this. Ask your druggist how very popular Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin has become. It gives the right kind of help, and right amount of help. Taking a little less each time, gives the bowels a chance to act of their own accord, until they are moving regularly and thoroughly without any help at all.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin contains senna and cascara—both natural laxatives that form no habit. The action is gentle, but sure. It will relieve any sluggishness or bilious condition due to constipation without upset.

MINNESOTA NEWS

Monticello—Toboggan milk service was inaugurated by farmers near here after heavy windswept snows buried roads under deep drifts.

Preston—Thomas J. Meighen, 80, banker, political leader and farmer in this territory for many years, died at a hospital at Pittsburgh where he was visiting relatives.

Minneapolis—Figures from the United States bureau of roads place Minnesota third among all the states in mileage of highway improvements completed with federal emergency funds.

Kenyon—Climaxing a civic controversy that started several months ago, Kenyon citizens voted to retain management of the city light, power and water department in a three-man commission.

St. Paul—Magnus Johnson is greatly improved but not yet out of danger, his physician reports. The former United States senator has been critically ill in St. Luke's hospital, suffering from pneumonia.

Mankato—Fire broke out in 15 below zero weather here in the Landkamer furniture store, completely razing the building and for a time threatening the entire business block. Loss was estimated at $75,000.

Minneapolis—Forty men, many of them WPA workers, were jailed and booked as drunks after a score of calls sent police patrols to the Gateway. Payroll checks for WPA workers were issued the day before.

Browns Valley—Snow blocked highways prevented outside help in fighting a fire on the main street here. Because the water was frozen, snow was used to quench the flames, but not before two buildings were destroyed.

St. Paul—Delegates to the midwinter conference of the Minnesota League of Building, Loan and Savings associations here urged active support to a proposed amendment to the state constitution for the removal of the tax levy on general property for state purposes.

Minneapolis—The sixth International Six-Day bike race will be held in the auditorium February 20 to 26. Willie Spencer is in charge again and promises that plenty of the old favorites will be back augmented by several new champions to this territory. The race is sponsored by the Milk Fund.

Jackson—A mysterious farmhouse fire which claimed the lives of two women and two babies is being investigated by the sheriff's office as the wounded head of the family is under guard at a local hospital. Silence of Paul Poelaert, the father of the burned children complicates matters. His wife and mother also died in the flames.

Faribault—The daughter of Mrs. Vernon Fliehler is doing quite well, thank you, after entering the world by instructions given over the phone. Heavy drifts blocked the roads to the Fliehler home, making it impossible for a doctor to get in there in time. Instructions given to Mrs. Fliehler's mother by Dr. C. M. Robilliard, enabled her to handle the case alone.

Minneapolis—The jury which heard the second trial of Carl H. Fredlund on a third degree murder charge growing out of the death of Mrs. Walter P. Busch of Pipestone and her son in the Shokopee highway crash August 11, failed to reach a verdict after 71 hours behind locked doors. The defendant's bond was extended as County Attorney Ed. T. Goff plans on a new trial.

St. Paul—Between federal, state and local contributions, the state will spend $8,450,000 for old age pensions from March 1 to June 30, 1937, Kenneth Haycraft, state director, announced. A total of $4,331,000 is expected from Washington, the state has authorized $2,750,000 and counties will raise about $1,375,000. County boards will get the new application blanks next week.

St. Paul—Removal of carp and other rough fish from Big Stone lake, ratification by the United States senate of a migratory wild fowl protection treaty with Mexico, transfer of deer from Itasca park to avert loss from starvation and a ban on spearing of fish until the regular angling season opens next spring was voted by the state conservation commission. Governor Olson will be asked to issue an executive order closing all lakes and streams immediately to spearing of fish with or without lights in order to protect wall-eyed pike and pickerel. Closing until May 14 in the southern zone and until May 19 in the northern zone, when the hook and line angling seasons open, was recommended by Thaddeus Surber, director of fish propagation.

Duluth—Final action in the campaign to provide high grade seed wheat for northwest farmers was completed when the interstate commerce commission at Washington authorized low emergency freight rates on seed wheat from Minneapolis, Duluth and other points. More than 4,000,000 bushels of No. 1 wheat, held by the federal surplus commodity corporation from the 1934 harvest, will be available to northwest farmers at $1.10 a bushel, plus freight, which may be reduced 50 per cent of the carload rate.

HEART OF CHICKEN IS KEPT GOING 24 YEARS BY SURGEON

The only bit of flesh in the world that grows no older is pulsing with abundant life in a spic-and-span laboratory on the fifth floor of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, in New York city.

Twenty-four years ago Dr. Alexis Carrel, a wizard of experimental surgery, set it going in the glass bulb in which it now lies. Swishing pumps supply it with a steady stream of a red fluid compounded in the laboratory to provide nutrition. Drains carry away its waste products as fast as they are formed.

Each week a portion of the flesh must be cut away, or else it would long since have outgrown its glassy home. Scientists have calculated that, had it been permitted to enlarge indefinitely at its regular rate, it would by this time have covered the earth.

On January 17, 1912, Doctor Carrel took the original piece from the living heart of an unborn chick. Hundreds of previous experiments had taught him the kind of nutrient fluid it needed for perpetual life.

This substance, made of chemicals and gases and some of the constituents of blood, looks like watery mercurochrome. The bit of heart is bathed in it, and steadily the flesh contracts and expands—beats—just as it would had it been part of a real, living chicken.

It has already outlived five generations of chickens, and so far as biologists could tell, it was no "older" than when it first came to the laboratory.

It still acts the same way, increases in size at the same rate. Doctor Carrel has said that it is, in fact, "immortal," so long as the pumps supply it with the necessary fluid.—Literary Digest.

History's outstanding example of the value of hygienic living is Luigi Cornaro, whose serious sickness when he was forty years of age directed his attention to regulating his habits of life. Instead of dying before fifty, as a result of what was considered starvation diet, he lived to be one hundred.

In his eighty-fourth year he wrote his celebrated book showing how he had achieved health, high spirits and an unfailing interest in the life of his age.

Do You Ever Wonder Whether the "Pain" Remedy You Use is SAFE?

Ask Your Doctor and Find Out

Don't Entrust Your Own or Your Family's Well-Being to Unknown Preparations

THE person to ask whether the preparation you or your family are taking for the relief of headaches is SAFE to use regularly is your family doctor. Ask him particularly about Genuine BAYER ASPIRIN.

He will tell you that before the discovery of Bayer Aspirin most "pain" remedies were advised against by physicians as bad for the stomach and, often, for the heart. Which is food for thought if you seek quick, safe relief.

Scientists rate Bayer Aspirin among the fastest methods yet discovered for the relief of headaches and the pains of rheumatism, neuritis and neuralgia. And the experience of millions of users has proved it safe for the average person to use regularly. In your own interest remember this.

You can get Genuine Bayer Aspirin at any drug store — simply by asking for it by its full name, BAYER ASPIRIN. Make it a point to do this — and see that you get what you want.

PINEAPPLE JUICE

Keeps Pace with the Demand

THERE is an old saying that good things come in small packages, or something to that effect. If we were to let ourselves believe this, it would be depressing indeed. We would all have to go Pollyanna and keep reminding ourselves that there's an almost unlimited supply of the very best things—golden sunshine on a January morning, silver rain on a July afternoon, books, music, friends and food.

In Hawaii, where sunshine is dished out with so lavish a hand that people go out full of curiosity when it happens to rain, pineapples ripen on fields so vast that the supply appears unlimited, indeed. In spite of the fact that the demand for pineapples and for pineapple juice has increased steadily, since this food-for-kings became food-for-the-people, the supply goes right on increasing with the demand. Pineapple planters and pineapple canners evidently don't believe there can ever be too much of it.

To Your Health!

And where there's pineapple there's bound to be pineapple juice. So, it is in anything but "small packages" that this good drink comes to us. Use it, therefore, in abundance. The following are only a few of many ways that are daily being devised to enjoy this healthful, delicious juice in cans.

Holiday Fruit Creamade: Mash four bananas thoroughly, add one-half cup confectioner's sugar, one cup cream and the contents of two No. 2 cans of pineapple juice. Shake thoroughly with crushed ice in a cocktail shaker or glass jar. Unless a very large shaker is used, half the quantity should be shaken at a time. Serve immediately in tall glasses. This serves eight persons.

Marshmallow Fruit Loaf: Soften one tablespoon gelatin in one-fourth cup of canned pineapple juice, then dissolve in one cup more of canned pineapple juice which has been brought to boiling. Add one-third cup sugar and stir until dissolved. Cool, add the syrup from one cup of canned fruits for salad. When the mixture begins to stiffen, add one beaten egg white and one-half cup of cream which has been whipped. Add the fruits for salad which have been cut in suitable pieces, eight diced marshmallows and one sliced banana. Pour into a loaf pan which has been wet with cold water. Chill, turn out and slice. Garnish with whipped cream if desired. Serves eight persons.*

Who was that old-fashioned politician who predicted that the revenue Uncle Sam got in the way of liquor tax would be enough to balance the budget?

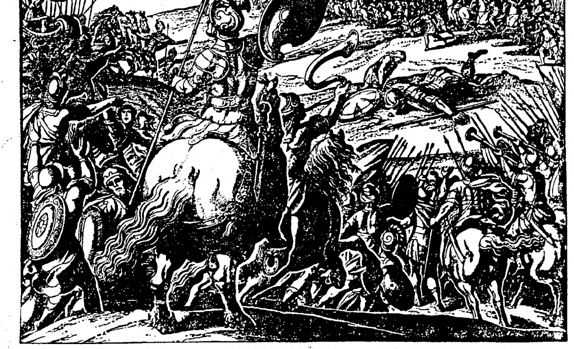
The Story of the Bible Told in Pictures



David Kills Goliath.—The armies of the Philistines were gathered together, and Saul and his men prepared to battle against them. The two armies were camped opposite one another. "And there went out a champion out of the camp of the Philistines named Goliath, of Gath, whose height was six cubits and a span"—I Sam. 17: 4. "And he stood and cried unto the armies of Israel, 'Choose you a man for you, and let him come down to me. If he be able to fight with me, and to kill me, then will we be your servants; but if I prevail against him, and kill him, then shall ye be our servants and serve us.'"—I Sam. 17: 8-9. David accepted the challenge of Goliath. "And David put his hand in his bag, and took thence a stone, and slang it, and smote the Philistine in his forehead, that the stone sunk into his forehead; and he fell upon his face to the earth."—I Sam. 17: 49. This illustration by Merian was engraved in 1625.

Many Attend Coop Meeting Despite Cold

Central President Lauds F. C. A. As Biggest Aid To Farmers

In spite of the extremely cold weather which prevailed in the state last week, livestock producers from all sections migrated to St. Paul to attend the fifteenth annual stockholders' convention of the Central Co-Operative Association, which was held in the Lowry Hotel on Wednesday and Thursday, February 12 and 13. At this meeting members of this farmer-owned co-operative livestock sales agency of South St. Paul had the opportunity to hear educational addresses on various phases of the livestock industry by some of the most outstanding men in their respective lines.

Local delegates to the convention from this vicinity included A. C. Knudsen, Fred Diedrich, August W. Anderson and Wm. Godel. Emil Stark was the representative from Angus.

This two-day convention was opened by C. B. Crandall, president of the Central Cooperative association, who brought to the attention of his listeners that they had just completed one of the worst years in the history of agriculture in this part of the United States, yet had come through with banners flying and with renewed courage to carry their organization to new heights of achievement in future years.

Mr. Crandall paid a high tribute to the Farm Credit Administration, which he says is by far the most important of the several branches of Government in its service to agriculture.

"In its several banks, the Farm Credit Administration supplies ample credit to take care of all requirements of agriculture. Probably the Land Bank has performed the most important benefit because it has to do with the farm home, which is of first importance. Nothing that our Government has attempted to do has brought to agriculture such profound relief and security as the long-time credit which has been provided at a reasonable rate of interest. This service has eliminated the fear of farmers losing their homes or their entire investment. It has restored a feeling of confidence and has given farmers new hope for the future."

N. K. Carnes, General Manager of the Central Co-Operative Association, reviewed Central business activities and the livestock situation in his address, laying stress upon the membership of the organization.

He reported, "On Dec. 31, 1935, the Central Coop. had as member stockholders 548 livestock shipping associations in Minnesota, Wisconsin, North Dakota, South Dakota and Montana, which owned common stock in the organization costing $25.00 per share, and 14,941 individual farmer members who are owners of preferred stock costing $1.00 per share. The total value of the stock issued and outstanding on Dec. 31, 1935, was $34,791.00.

"It is inteersting to note that with this small amount of stock outstanding, the Central handled a business of $16,682.15. It is also interesting to note that with a decrease of approximately 30 per cent in volume, our gross sales were $3,300,000 larger than the previous year. This, of course, is due to the increase in livestock prices.

"It is very gratifying to me to be able to report a net savings for 1935 of $57,285.23."

L. A. Rossman, publisher of the Herald-Review at Grand Rapids and past president of the Minnesota Editorial Association, gave his audience at the banquet Wednesday night a vivid portrayal of the meaning of public debt. He stated that it meant nothing to the average person to know that the national debt is now thirty billions of dollars.

"The amount of the national debt," he says, "is best understood by reduction to a per capita basis and by comparison with state and local debts."

"Minnesota has a state debt of 117 million dollars. This is $46.00 for each man, woman and child in the state. The debt of the Federal Government is now $25.00 for each person in the United States.

"The people of Minnesota have obligations for public debt, local, state and national, which amounts to more than 900 million dollars. This is more than half of the assessed valuation of all of the property of the state. The total per capita indebtedness is approximately $400.00 for each man, woman and child of Minnesota. This is equivalent to $2,000.00 for the average family.

Mr. Rossman did not lay the responsibility of the debt upon any group of public officials. He really put the blame upon the people of the country.

STEINER FARMERS BUY STOCK AT VALLEY SALE

Farmers of the Steiner community bought several head of stock at the consignment sale of purebred livestock held at Crookston last Thursday in connection with the Valley Winter Shows. L. A. Meyer purchased a two-year-old Hereford heifer consigned by the Schermerhorn Farms of Mahnomen and also a Duroc Jersey sow. Aberdeen Angus heifers were bought by Berg Brothers and Melvin Saugen.—Thief River Falls Times.

"DANISH RED" CATTLE TO BE TRIED IN MINNESOTA

A new breed of dairy cattle, developed within the last 50 years, is to be used in breeding experiments by the Waseca branch of the Minnesota Experiment station, in cooperation with the United States Department of Agriculture.

The cattle came originally from Denmark, but the 22 heifers and 2 bulls to be used in the Waseca experiments were imported from the Virgin Islands, West Indies. They are known as "Red Danish," and rose from a foundation of native Scandinavian red cattle, improved with selections from the leading breeds of continental Europe.

The heifers in the shipment to be sent to Waseca are each 2 years old, and the bulls are yearlings. Mature Danish Red cattle are of medium height, weigh from 1,100 to 1,200 pounds, and range in color from light red to a deep cherry red. The dams of the heifers in the shipment averaged 525 pounds of butterfat a year ,and the dams of the sires averaged 622 pounds. The dam of one of the two bulls averaged 768 pounds, and the dam of the other bull 637.

Red Danish milk cattle make up about 95 per cent of the dairy cow population on the Danish islands, and the greater part of that on the southeast coast of Jutland. Nearly 50 per cent are in control associations which keep careful production records, and are similar to the dairy herd improvement associations of this country.

MILLWORK MANUFACTURED BY NORTHERN WOODWORK

All millwork, including doors and windows, for the new Warren Creamery, was manufactured by the Northern Woodwork Company of Thief River Fals. This organization, formed in 1920, has made steady progress and now has the most complete wood working plant in this territory. Besides all types of general millwork the company manufactures store fixtures and church equipment, and is gaining recognition thruout northwestern Minnesota and North Dakota for the quality ad craftsmanship of its products. Officers of the company are E. O. Iverson, president; T. J. Rustad, secretary and treasurer, and H. M. Grendahl, vice president. For several years the plant has operated at full capacity.

Cold Weather Cuts WPA Job Time In Minnesota

As unprecedented cold held into the last half of February, cutting time on the job for most WPA workers to less than half of the 30-hour week, the 65,000 employees of the federal work relief agency in Minnesota continued to get their regular semi-monthly checks in the full amount.

Figures released this week by the office of Victor Christgau, state WPA administrator, showed January expenditures to be $4,274,549, at their highest point since the beginning of the program.

Of the $20,750,936 in federal funds allocated to Minnesota, $9,399,133 had been expended on Feb. 1 of which $8,467,987 was paid to employees, the balance going for supplies, equipment and contractual services.

Expenditures by districts up to February 1 were as follows: Duluth district, $1,605,059; Brainerd district, $748,139; St. Paul district, $2,265,315; Rochester district, $457,857; Minneapolis district, $2,465,144; St. Cloud district, $512,296; Detroit Lakes district, $589,901; Morris district, $394,851 and New Ulm district, $322,545. On state-wide projects $34,031 was expended.

"The WPA policy of providing continuity of employment, because of adverse weather conditions, has thrown the program out of balance," Mr. Christgau said. "Adjustments will have to be made and more money will have to be provided for completion of some of the projects. But we are glad that this policy exists, throwing the burden on administrative shoulders rather than workers who would suffer if it were not in effect."

He pointed out that the fact that workers are paid even though weather conditions do not make work practical, in effect, has amounted to an increase in wages.

As soon as a break in the weather permits he said the program of farm-to-market road development will be emphasized.

"This winter's blizzards serve to stress the fact that farm-to-market roads in most districts of the state need improvements," he said. "Grades are too low and snow blocked conditions often make travel for farmers next to impossible during considerable periods of winter and spring. We are at work now preparing facts and figures for Washington calling these conditions to official attention in an effort to secure more funds for the areas most in need of this type of work."

POPULATION OF U. S. SET AT 127,521,000

The 1935 population of the United States Saturday was officially estimated by the census bureau at 127,521,000. The official count is taken as of the middle of the year—July 1.

The new figures represented a gain of 0.71 per cent from 1934, and of 4 per cent from 1930 when the last actual census was taken.

"If the increase should be continued at this rate until the end of the decade," the bureau said, "the nation's population in 1940 would be around 132,000,000."

Keep the Foreign Junk Out

Nearly half a billion dollars' worth of farm products have been imported into this country in the last six months, about $50 lost to each of our ten million farmers. Others may believe that is good for this country. We do not agree. Give us the power and we would do what the late "Fire Alarm" Flanagan of Carthage used to say he wanted done—"make the tariff not for revenue, but high enough to keep the damn foreign junk out of here."—Nevada, Mo., Herald.

How Much Does Advertising Cost?

Not long ago, we heard a house-to-house salesman tell a prospect: "I can sell you this gadget 25 per cent cheaper because my firm doesn't advertise."

How much does advertising cost? As a customer every day in your life, you are entitled to know.

Automobiles are extensively advertised. But only 3½% of the selling price of a car goes for advertising, or about $17 on a $500 machine. Before large scale advertising, you paid $1,000 for a car not so good.

Coffee, canned goods, soft drinks, etc., having large advertising budgets. Only 5½% of the selling cost, or ½ cent on a 10-cent can, is used for promotional advertising.

The average retail store spends from 1% to 4% on advertising. That costs you from one cent to four cents on a dollar purchase.

IS IT WORTH YOUR WHILE TO PAY THIS MUCH FOR THE KNOWLEDGE THAT ADVERTISING GIVES YOU? AND DO YOU THINK THE LOW PRICES ON EXTENSIVELY ADVERTISED PRODUCTS WOULD BE POSSIBLE WITHOUT THE VOLUME PRODUCTION THAT IS ENTIRELY DEDENDENT UPON ADVERTISING?

NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING PAYS YOU DIVIDENDS!

IT PAYS TO ADVERTISE

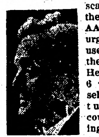
Norris Urges Congress to Curb Supreme Court—Oratory on Lincoln Day—Death of Charles Curtis—Long Newspaper Tax Invalid.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

SPEAKING in advocacy of the administration's substitute farm bill, Senator Norris, the independent Republican from Nebraska, scathingly attacked the Supreme court's AAA decision and urged congress to use its right to curb the court's power. He argued that the 6 to 3 decision itself was unconstitutional by the court's own reasoning and shouted "It cannot stand."



Senator Norris

"The regulation of agricultural production, they say is unconstitutional because not mentioned in the Constitution," Norris asserted. "Nowhere in that great document is there a syllable, a word, or a sentence giving to any court the right to declare an act of congress unconstitutional. Hence, when the court indulges in that pastime it is itself violating the Constitution according to its own words."

Norris quoted from the majority opinion of the Supreme court holding that the regulation and control of agricultural production was a local affair reserved to the states and beyond the power of congress. Under that decision, he declared, not only the pending bill but "a large portion of the laws which congress has passed during the last hundred years are absolutely unconstitutional."

Of the later decision ordering return of processing taxes to the processors, the senator said Secretary Wallace perhaps was too severe in calling it the greatest legalized steal in history, and added: "But it is a gift, the greatest gift since God made salvation free."

Norris urged that congress pass a law requiring unanimous decisions by the Supreme court to overrule the acts of the legislative branch of the government.

LINCOLN day was the occasion for a flood of oratory, largely by Republican opponents of the New Deal. Herbert Hoover spoke at Portland, Ore., on the "State of the Union," which he said was a state of confusion in thought, government, economic life, and the ideals of liberty. "The New Deal," said the former President, "has been a veritable fountain of fear. The day after the New Deal was given life at the election of 1932 began the great fear which created the bank panic of March 4. The stock boom today is not from confidence in the future; it is partly from fear of inflation."

In Greensboro, N. C., Senator Dickinson of Iowa warmly defended the Supreme court as "the only remaining guardian of the liberty of the people," and inveighed against what he said was the New Deal's "planned economy" and its "attempted bribery of the states" through the invalidated AAA and its proposed substitute, the soil conservation measure.

Senator Vandenberg of Michigan was a speaker in New York city, and like his fellow Republicans he fiercely assailed the administration, terming it the "third party now in power."

Among the few leading Democrats heard was Secretary Wallace, who, in Indianapolis, defended the administration. Referring to the Constitution, he declared that "most of us" thought the agriculture adjustment act was valid, and "some of us, including three justices of the Supreme court, think so still." He continued concerning the new farm bill: "If it was the proper function of the federal government in wartime to encourage farmers to plow up land which should never have been plowed then it seems to me no less the federal government's proper function to encourage the return of that land to grass and trees."

CHARLES CURTIS, former Vice President of the United States and before that representative and senator from Kansas, died suddenly of heart disease at the Washington home of his brother-in-law and sister, Mr. and Mrs. Edward E. Gann. He was seventy-six years old, and was the first man of Indian blood ever to preside over the senate. He was one quarter Kaw Indian, his grandmother having been Princess Julie of that tribe who married a French voyageur. In his boyhood Curtis was a jockey, and later a reporter. Having studied law, he became a prosecutor at the age of twenty-four in Shawnee county, Kansas, and was elected to congress in 1892. He was made senator in 1907, was defeated in 1912, and two years later was again elected senator. He was elected Vice President on the ticket headed by Herbert Hoover, and was renominated for that position in 1932.

Charles Curtis

Mr. Curtis was greatly liked by his associates in Washington and his death caused genuine grief. President Roosevelt said:

"I am deeply distressed to learn of the sudden passing of my old friend, Charles Curtis. Whether they knew him as a senator, as the Vice President of the United States, or as the man he was in his own right, his legion of friends will remember him, always affectionately, and will mourn his passing."

Vice President Garner said:

"I was always fond of him. I was associated with him in the house and senate. He was a fine man and a good friend."

Funeral services for Mr. Curtis and the interment were in Topeka, Kan.

ONCE again the Supreme court of the United States comes to the rescue of a free press. Unanimously the nine justices ruled that the Louisiana law imposing a punitive tax on the advertising of the principal newspapers of that state is unconstitutional. The law was passed by a legislature controlled by the late Senator Huey Long. The court said of it:

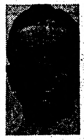
"It is bad because, in the light of its history and of its present setting, it is seen to be a deliberate and calculated device in the guise of a tax to limit the circulation of information to which the public is entitled in virtue of the constitutional guarantee.

"A free press stands as one of the great interpreters between the government and the people. To allow it to be fettered is to fetter ourselves.

"In view of the persistent search for new subjects of taxation, it is not without significance that, with the single exception of the Louisiana statute, so far as we can discover, no state during the 150 years of our national existence has undertaken to impose a tax like that now in question.

"The form in which the tax is imposed is in itself suspicious. It is not measured or limited by the volume of advertisements. It is measured alone by the extent of the circulation of the publication in which the advertisements are carried, with the plain purpose of penalizing the publishers and curtailing the circulation of a selected group of newspapers."

PRESIDENT WILLIAM L. RANSOM of the American Bar association, with headquarters in Chicago, announced that Newton D. Baker, former secretary of war, has accepted the chairmanship of the association's special committee on co-operation between the press, radio and bar against publicity interfering with fair trial of judicial and quasi-judicial proceedings.



N. D. Baker

The creation of this special committee to define standards to be recommended to lawyers, newspapers and radio broadcasters in the matter of publicity as to court trials, said the announcement, is an outcome of the incidents arising in the course of the Bruno Hauptmann trial and various proceedings before government boards and bodies, "and it is hoped that such standards can be made effective through rules of court or through legislation."

ACCORDING to the London Daily Herald, a secret decree providing for expulsion of all Jews from Germany as rapidly as possible has been prepared by Nazi leaders and laid before Chancellor Hitler for his signature. The paper said the decree provided for the confiscation of all property of expelled Jews.

This story may not be true, but there is no doubt that Hitler and his associates are determined to extirpate all the organizations and groups which they consider in opposition to the Nazi regime, and Hitler himself has declared the Jews are to blame for all the troubles of the reich in recent years. Scores of Catholic youth leaders have been arrested, charged with co-operation with illegal Communist groups, and it is predicted their organizations will be dissolved. The campaign is carried on with great secrecy. It was announced in Berlin that district governors henceforth would take orders from the Gestapo, the secret state police

LETTERS have been sent by President Roosevelt to the heads of the Latin-American governments inviting them to participate in a Pan-American conference, probably in Washington, the purpose of which will be to organize the peace machinery of the western hemisphere. Our State department says the meeting will endeavor to provide means for adjusting international disputes by peaceful means. The conference may bring up the Monroe Doctrine for a new definition through multilateral endorsement.

ELMER B. O'HARA, Democratic state chairman of Michigan, and former clerk of Wayne county, which includes Detroit; State Senator A. J. Wilkowski and 16 others of lesser prominence were convicted in Detroit of having attempted to steal the 1934 election. Eight defendants in the recount case, which had been on trial for nearly 12 weeks, were acquitted. Two other defendants previously had pleaded guilty, thus bringing to 20 the number facing sentence for their part in the vote recount conspiracy.

Elmer B. O-Hara

For O'Hara the verdict came as the culmination of a series of calamities in a brief political career. Last November a jury in Macomb county, adjacent to Wayne, found him guilty of bribery in a drainage transaction in connection with real estate deals he had made before 1932, when he entered politics and was elected Wayne county clerk. He awaits sentence under that conviction. After conviction he was removed from office.

In the recount case O'Hara was found guilty on three counts, permitting others to alter ballots, conspiring to permit others to alter ballots, and conspiring to permit others to conduct the recount in an unlawful manner and change the result of the November, 1934, election by putting Democrats in office instead of the Republicans elected.

ACTION against John J. Raskob, former chairman of the Democratic national committee when Al Smith was the Presidential nominee, and who is now president of the American Liberty league, has been begun by the government for an alleged deficiency of $1,026,340 on his 1929 income taxes. The claim was filed in an amendment to the petition recently filed against Pierre S. du Pont two days before Al Smith in Washington had bitterly assailed the New Deal. In the petition, which Raskob described as "New Deal persecution," Mr. du Pont was alleged to have understated his 1929 income by $2,897,832 and an additional tax of $617,316 was asked. In the amended petition accusing Mr. Raskob, it was alleged that he and the industrialist engaged in "fictitious" sales of securities, one to the other, to a total of about $30,000,000 for the purpose of showing losses.

J. J. Raskob

THE British government looks with disfavor on the proposal, made by Lloyd George and others, that such discontented nations as Germany and Italy be pacified by a redistribution of colonies and mandated territories. James H. Thomas, colonial secretary, told the house of commons flatly that "British colonies could not be made the subject of barter in any world conference" and that Great Britain is not going to hand over any colonies or mandates to other countries. The house applauded his statement and adopted this resolution:

"This house is opposed to the transfer to any other lands of British colonies or mandated territories, for the welfare, protection, and enlightened government of whose peoples the British nation holds an honorable trust."

LEADERS in congress hope for an early adjournment, by May 1 at the latest, and therefore they pushed the new farm bill forward, trying to get it through both houses without much delay. In their desire to get away from the Capital, they already had decided to let the proposed permanent neutrality legislation go by the board.

The farm bill as rewritten by the senate agriculture committee is based on the soil erosion prevention scheme. Some Democrats joined with many Republicans in opposing the measure, one of them being Senator Walsh of Massachusetts.

Chairman Doughton of the house ways and means committee said he expected definite word from the White House or treasury soon on the amount and kind of taxes that might be proposed to finance the new farm program.

Speaker Byrns said he could see no reason why the tax measure should not emerge from the committee by the end of February.

He and [illegible] they had no [illegible] on what [illegible] 000, [illegible] through excise taxes.

DOWNRIGHT war between the Chinese armies of Dictator Chiang Kai-shek and the Japanese appeared almost certain when the autonomy movement in north China was revived in eastern Hopei and Chahar provinces by Yin Ju-keng, the administrative commissioner and friend of Japan. Leaders of the rest of the region were undecided on their course, but Japanese troops began to pour in by the trainload. Three thousand of them with full war equipment arrived in Tientsin, and the garrison at Peiping was more than doubled. The Fengtai railway junction a few miles from Peiping was seized, Colonel Takahashi, military attache, asserting this was necessary because the rolling stock was being moved south, threatening the isolation of the Japanese forces.

Gen. Chiang Kai-shek

In Nanking officials said the national government was determined to meet with force any attempt to force autonomy on the territory south of Hopei and Chahar provinces, and the executive Yuan proclaimed five sweeping reforms designed to stop the spread of the movement. Chiang was hurrying large bodies of troops to the northward. He also sought to hold the support of the Shantung war lord, Han Fu-chu, by entrusting him with the defense of the northern Honan and Shantung frontiers, and promising him money and supplies, if needed, to stem invasion. Han Fu-chu of late has been wooed assiduously by the Japanese.

Wang Ching-wei, premier and foreign minister of the Nationalist government, resigned as president of the cabinet. He has not fully recovered from the recent attempt to assassinate him. Gen. Shang Chen, governor of Hopei province, also resigned, accepting the responsibility for failure to check the autonomy plot.

NOVEMBER 29 had been set as the date for a meeting of the League of Nations sanctions committee to consider the imposition of an oil embargo against Italy, but Premier Laval and British Ambassador George Russell Clerk, after a conference in Paris, recommended that the session be indefinitely postponed, and this action was taken. The statesmen feared early oil sanctions would seriously aggravate the political situation, and Laval thought if he were given more time he might bring about the conciliation of the Italo-Ethiopian quarrel.

Premier Laval

There were good reasons for the uneasiness of the French and British governments. Benito Mussolini had bluntly told the world that the imposition of an oil embargo would mean war in Europe, the warning being given through his ambassador to France, Vittorio Cerruti. Furthermore, there was doubt in London and Paris concerning the ability of the United States government to prevent the shipment of oil to Italian ports. In Washington it was reported that Ambassador Augusto Rosso had discussed the matter with Secretary of State Hull, suggesting that attempts to choke off exports of oil, copper, cotton and other commercial articles did not constitute "orthodox" neutrality.

Emperor Haile Selassie made two airplane flights to the fighting fronts in Ethiopia and cheered up his forces so that their resistance to the invasion was measurably stiffened, especially in the South. The government at Addis Ababa announced that its armies had driven the Italian troops back from Gorahai, recapturing the town of Gerlogubi by encircling movements. In the northern sector, according to the official communique, a thousand Italians occupying Makale retreated sixty miles to Adigrat. Losses on both sides were increasing.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT was mighty busy at Warm Springs studying the departmental estimates for the budget of 1936-37. Representative James P. Buchanan of Texas, chairman of the house appropriations committee, took part in the first conference and told the correspondents that he would carry a budget of not more than $500,000,000 in excess of estimated revenues through the house by "a devil of a fight." Then Mr. Buchanan, who didn't appear to have White House support for this stand, left suddenly for Washington, refusing to explain his departure; and the conference continued with Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau, Acting Budget Director Bell and Mark Shields, clerk of the appropriations committee.

The President told the press they were making distinct progress in arranging the federal finances, having already cut the departmental estimates by $400,000,000. He contradicted reports that he was contemplating revision of the Ickes PWA and the Hopkins WPA to ease the friction between the two New Deal officials. He asserted a good many similar rumors will be circulated, but no one will know anything about the budget until it is sent to congress.

Mrs. Roosevelt and James, the President's eldest son, joined him at Warm Springs for Thanksgiving day dinner.

SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR ICKES has revived the controversy between the New Dealers and the big steel corporations concerning steel prices. Mr. Ickes said there was "prima facie evidence of collusion" in identical bids on a Florida public works project. The PWA administrator said the four companies bidding $185,000 each on 3,300 tons of steel for a Miami dock—Inland, Carnegie, Jones & Laughlin, and Kalman (a Bethehem subsidiary)—were the same that submitted identical bids on an ocean terminal at Morehead City, N. C., and the Triborough bridge in New York city.

Sec'y Ickes

In the two earlier instances German concerns underbid and were awarded the contracts. Amid protests from industry and labor Ickes then halted all additional foreign purchases and raised the differential in favor of domestic materials from 15 to 25 per cent.

There was no foreign bidder on the Miami project and Mr. Ickes said the contract would be awarded to the concern "that is farthest away and has to pay the highest freight bill—the object is to spread prosperity around."

ELEVEN American diplomats and naval officers, selected by Secretary of State Hull, have sailed to represent this country in the coming naval conference in London. At their head is Norman H. Davis, the President's ambassador-at-large for Europe, who participated in the preliminary conversations last year. Acting with him will be Undersecretary of State William Phillips and Admiral William H. Standley, chief of naval operations. Advisers to the delegation will be Ray Atherton, counselor of the American embassy in London, and E. H. Dooman of the State department, who knows all about Japanese and other Far Eastern affairs.

N. H. Davis

Noel H. Field of the division of western European affairs, who attended the last naval conversations, and Samuel Reber, secretary of the American legation in Bern, Switzerland, will act as technical assistants.

The navy's four technical experts will be Capt. Royal E. Ingersol, Commander Roscoe E. Schuirmann, Lieut. Arthur D. Ayrault, and Lieut. J. R. Fulton.

David M. Key, assistant chief of the division of current information, will act as press officer for the delegation in its contacts with foreign newspaper men, and R. Allen Haden will serve as the delegation's secretary.

When the conversations in London have gone far enough to indicate what the several nations may be expected to do, President Roosevelt will direct the course to be followed by Mr. Davis and his colleagues. It is taken for granted they will strive to bring about an agreement for the limiting of future naval construction.

THERE was terror throughout Germany when Hitler started what apparently was another "purge." Hundreds of persons were arrested and taken to prison or concentration camps, those taken including some minor officials of the Nazi party in Berlin. Many others were known as Socialists. The others were known as Socialists. The composed of war veterans, was suppressed and its leaders jailed.

BRAZIL was experiencing another revolt, in the northern part of the country. Latest advices said the rebels had control of the city of Natal and that a hot fight was on for possession of Pernambuco. The uprising was laid to the Communists and was believed to be led by Luis Carlos Prestes, Communist leader for all of South America. It was said he planned to spread the movement all over Brazil, Argentina, Paraguay and Chile.

Under command of Gen. Manuel Rabelo, the federal troops, army and navy airplanes and two cruisers were hurriedly sent northward to combat the rebellion.

Several days later a revolt broke out in Rio Janeiro, the capital, despite extraordinary precautions. The principal participants there were the aviation force. They seized the aviation field but government troops recaptured it and it was announced this outbreak had been suppressed.

Finally the Brazilian government announced that the revolt in the North also had been crushed and that 138 persons had been killed in the four days of fighting.

STORMS JUST PAST COST STATE $800,000 FOR SNOW PLOWING

It has cost the state highway department approximately $800,000 to keep its 11,000 mile trunk highway system open to traffic during the almost continuous storm conditions of the past three and a half weeks, according to an estimate made by N. W. Elsberg, state highway commissioner.

"With 400 state plows and 100 rented emergency trucks and tractors going day and night most of the time since late in January, the expense has been a severe strain on highway maintenance funds," Mr. Elsberg said.

"With the 500 units all in operation, the cost runs up to $2,000 per hour. Much of the time the plows have worked 20 hours a day. For every such day the cost is $40,000. These figures are based on an average total cost of $4 an hour per unit operated. The lighter trucks cost less than this, but the average is brought up by the heavy equipment and rotaries. The cost includes labor as well as machinery expense.

"Our snow fighting expense so far this winter is in the neighborhood of $1,000,000, which comes out of a total maintenance budget for the year of only $6,600,000. Our total snow expense last winter was about $900,000.

"If the highway department had not fought to keep the trunks open, drawing heavily on maintenance funds to do so, there undoubtedly would have been general disruption of business and economic life throughout the state and widespread suffering. Without open highways, the Twin Cities and other cities would have been cut off from milk supplies and the smaller towns would have run short of food and other necessities.

"This emergency illustrates the danger of cutting down highway revenues below levels which experience have taught us are safe. There must be a margin of funds over and above routine necessities to met unpredictable emergencies such as winter storms and summer floods. Any serious crippling of the trunk system would mean famine for hundreds of thousands of persons if continued for more than a few days at a time.

"Even with all that was spent in the past month, there were still isolated cases in which communities did not get as good service from the highway department as we would like to have given them."

Is there anything more disgusting to hear than the fellow without any real complaint eternally howling? But how refreshing, when you hear the person you think has every reason to be downhearted always presenting the brightest side of life. Which do you think gets the most out of life?

State Seed Committee Facts

The following statement has been prepared by the State Seed Committee regarding the seed situation for 1936. The facts are being presented so that farmers may have an idea as to what they may expect of 1935 light seed grain. Following the facts is a brief outline of what steps should be taken by anyone planning to seed wheat in 1936. The seed situation is very serious and it is the advice of the County Extension Office that farmers should send in samples of their seed in order that it may be tested for germination.

1. One out of every five samples of 1935 wheat examined at University Farm was found to be unfit for seed, because of low germination and low weight per per bushel.

2. Light waight wheat produces such weak sprouts that there is little chance of their surviving an unfavorable spring or poorly prepared seed-bed.

3. Germination shows no relation to weight per bushel. Even plump samples may show low germination.

4. Seed treatment was found to improve germination 10 to 15 per cent.

5. The weight per bushel may be increased 2 to 3 pounds per bushel by fanning and grading. There is generally an improvement in the vigor of the sprouts as a result of removing the lighter seeds.

The committee urges the following steps be taken by any one planning no sow wheat in 1936.

1. Make a germination test on seed at once. Do not use any seed testing less than 70 to 80 per cent unless as a last resort.

2. Try to get seed which weighs 45 to 50 pounds per bushel or better. Fan and grade closely using only the heaviest possible for seed.

3. If wheat on the farm is found to be too light in weight and too low in germination, buy heavier seed if possible, of a recommended variety such as Thatcher, Ceres, Marquis, Mindum, Kubanka.

4. Treat the grain to be used for seed with New Improved Ceresan, following closely, directions by the manufacturers.

Sale of All U. S. Farms Wouldn't Pay 1937 Debt

Washington, D. C.—The total value of the 6,812,049 farms in the United States was $32,884,324,378 on January 31, 1935, it is reported by William L. Austin, director of the bureau of census. This valuation included all buildings and improvements.

With Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau estimating the national debt at 35½ billions of dollars for the coming fiscal year, it is seen that if all the farms in the nation were sold for cash at the value placed upon them by the bureau of census, and the proceeds applied upon the national debt for the 1937 fiscal year, the United States would still have to raise nearly 3 billion dollars to liquidate the debt.

This Pipe Was No 'Pipe'

Chicago.—A WPA pipe dream came to a rude awakening here when 100 of the federal "easy money" workers, after spending several days digging a long trench through ground frozen hard by weeks of sub-zero weather, found that the pipe they were going to lay had already been laid. It was a 12-inch storm sewer, 800 feet long. So the boys got several more days' work filling in the trench and trucking the new lengths of sewer-pipe back whence it came.

Another WPA "sanitary" project was begun here about the same time, when the educational division of the Hopkins organization started classes in "mental hygiene."

Taxes Paid on Drugs

New York.—Drug Trade News, a trade publication, found upon investigation that manufacturers in the drug and allied industries pay at least 71 taxes. Drug Topics, another trade paper, found that the "corner druggist" pays 78 taxes. All of these taxes are passed on to the consumer in the retail price of the drugs he buys from his "corner drug store."

Government Costs Burden Public

Chicago.—"The cost of all government in the United States in 1935 was as large as the total bill for food, clothing, rent and medical care for all of the population in the same period," S. Wells Utley, Detroit business man, told a gathering here. The federal payroll in March, 1933, required pay checks for 2,150,000 persons, while in December, 1935, 9,047,000 drew checks, he said.

Safetygrams BY FRED W. BRAUN © The Safety Man

The newspapers have carried some very tragic accounts of accidents due to carbon monoxide gas poisoning. Why people still insist on running a gasoline motor in a closed garage is beyond me. Can you fignre it out?

The average small one-car garage with doors and windows closed will develop enough gas in three minutes to kill you.

Recently several drivers stalled on the road ran the motor to keep the heater going, and were found dead the next morning by passing motorists. Carbon monoxide gas had killed them while they were trying to keep warm. Truck drivers frequently run their truck engine to keep warm while waiting at central points for messages, transfers, or orders and never live to tell the tale.

Carbon monoxide gas cannot be seen, connot be felt, and it is impossible to taste it. It is a deadly gas and kills quickly.

A. O. Aspelin and daughter Caroline and Mr. and Mrs. H. O. Hanson spent Friday afternoon and evening at Thief River Falls.

Must Settle Mud Lake April 1

Progress towards definite settlement of the Mud Lake appeal cases must be made by April 1 in order to assure completion of the project was learned by Marshall county official representatives who confered with E. V. Willard, Minnesota Commissioner of Conservation, in Saint Paul recently.

A. A. Trost, county attorney, J. J. Pagnag and A. W. Sommers, members of the county board of commissioners, attended the conference in St. Paul last week to learn of the progress being made in the settlement of the cases.

The county board is working on a program of adjustment of delinquent taxes which is hoped will lead to final settlement of the appeal cases and the early compeltion of the much discussed Mud Lake Wild Life preserve.

In case the Mud Lake project carried through, the commissioners also made a request that the state and federal government reconstruct a new highway around the southern border of the lake to take the place of the present State Aid Road "B" which is located approximately in the center of the prososed lake, said Mr. Trost. Indications are that this necessary request will be granted.

Faith an Essential to Life, Business, Marriage, Friendship

Without Which Our Very Foundations Are Shaken.

Unless we have faith the ground shifts beneath our feet. We are as uncertain as if we stood, or built, upon quicksands. We are sunk. Unless we change to firmer foundation, life is a losing proposition. It is rid of security, of happiness, of confidence, of any welcoming future. So cling to faith even in the most adverse circumstances. It is a necessary support, and a heartening help to mind and spirit.

Faith is not confined to religious experiences, although it is a fundamental of the spirit. Whatever the religion, whatever the church, faith is a necessary foundation; so true is this, that the word faith is frequently used in its stead. We often hear it said, "Of what faith is he?" meaning what church is he affiliated with. Yet the word is one of far broader meaning without losing any of its power or force. It is not segregated, but universal.

In Business.

Business is built on faith. Faith in the supply, and faith in the delivery of orders. Business trust is founded on faith in the persons trusted, or in the companies with whom dealings are carried on. Without faith business would be shattered. It is the part of good business to build up faith in it, and to be alert to know in whom to put faith.

Marriage rests on faith of husband and wife. Without it wedded life is but a travesty. Destruction of the home is imminent. Happiness flees. It is necessary for each person to be sufficiently adaptable to the other's likes and dislikes to learn to adjust to them if happiness is assured, but back of this there must exist an abiding faith.

Friendships are founded on faith. Acquaintances do not become friends without each person believes in the affection of the other, in the dependable reliance of the other. Friendships cease to exist when faith is gone.

Without faith in one's children, they are cramped in development. Without faith in one's own ability of accomplishment, success fades into failure. But in all aspects faith is not a phantom, a mirage, it is a firm foundation. The faith of a child in her mother, and a mother in her child is beautiful to see.

Tarahumara Indians Still Use Their Ancient Bows

The Tarahumara Indians, who inhabit the interior of the Sierra Madre in northern Sinaboa, in Mexico, live almost entirely independent of the white man, writes J. A. Hogle, Jr., in Popular Mechanics Magazine. They still hunt with bow and arrow and maintain their tribal customs, just as their ancestors did in pre-Columbian days. Their wants are few and, aided by nature, are met easily.

It is the belief of many that somewhere in a hidden inaccessible valley of the Sierra Madre exists the fabled cities of Cibola. There is no denying that these mountains, peopled as they are by various Indian tribes who have shunned the ways of the white man of whose past little is known, remain a fertile field for further exploration that may result in changing some of the fabled Indian stories into realities, just as Moore's expedition proved the Berranca del Cobre to exist instead of being a product of imagination as heretofore accepted.

SYNOPSIS

The youthful and comely "Widder" Marcia Howe has as her guest her late husband's niece, Sylvia Hayden. A stranger, on the verge of exhaustion, finds his way to Marcia's home. Secretly, he asks her to hide a package containing jewelry. She does so. Elisha Winslow, town sheriff, brings news of a jewel robbery nearby. The stranger gives his name as Stanley Heath. Sylvia discovers the jewels, and naturally believes Heath is a robber. She realizes that Marcia must have hidden them, and decides to say nothing. Marcia feels she has altogether too deep an interest in her guest, but is powerless to overcome it. Heath wires "Mrs. S. C. Heath," New York, saying he is safe. He also orders a man named Currier to come at once. Sylvia, in her room, bedecks herself with the jewels. At Marcia's approach she hides them there. Heath asks Marcia to bring them to him. They are gone! He kindly makes light of the loss. Sylvia restores the jewels to their original hiding place. Elisha Winslow, visiting Marcia, discovers the gems and has no doubt they are the stolen gems, and that Heath is the thief. Leaving the jewels, he makes plans for arresting Heath. Currier arrives. Marcia overhears Heath describe how he acquired the gems, and is forced to believe him guilty of theft. At Heath's suggestion, Currier investigates the hiding place—and finds the gems! He returns to New York with them, but his many references to "Mrs. Heath" have convinced Marcia her tender dream has been a foolish one.

CHAPTER VIII

—11—

In spite of Elisha's indignation toward Stanley Heath, and his resolve to go to the Homestead with the break of dawn, it was noon before he and Eleazer got under way.

In the first place, the two men disagreed as to the proper method of arresting the alleged criminal.

"You can't take him on no warrant, 'Lish," Eleazer objected, "'cause you ain't actually got proof he's guilty."

"Proof? Ain't I got a clear case? Ain't I roundin' him up with the loot on him?" blustered Elisha.

"P'raps—p'raps you didn't really see the jewels," Eleazer quavered. "Are you plumb certain you saw them things?"

"Certain?"

"Come, come! Don't go up in the air, 'Lish. I ain't doubtin' your word. I just want to make sure we don't take no mis-steps an' make jackasses of ourselves," Eleazer explained. "Have you got everythin'?"

"I—I—guess so," Elisha said weakly.

"Pete fixed up your badge in great shape, didn't he?" was Eleazer's cheerful comment. "It's bright as a new dollar. Anybody could see it a mile away. An' the handcuffs, too—they look grand. Wal, what do you say to our settin' out?"

The stroll to Crocker's Cove was not a hilarious one. With each successive step Elisha's spirits dropped lower and lower.

At last they came within sight of the bay.

"Where'd you leave the boat?" Eleazer questioned.

"I pulled her up opposite the fish-shanty."

"She ain't here."

"My soul an' body! What's to be done now?"

"I reckon we'll just have to give it all up," the sheriff responded with a sickly grin. "Call it off."

"An' let the thief escape? No sir—ee! We've got to go through with this thing now we've started if it takes a leg. We'll walk round by the shore."

In high dudgeon the two men plodded through the sand, its grit seeping into their shoes with every step.

It was not until they came within sight of the Homestead that the silence between them was broken.

"Wal, here we are!" Eleazer announced more genially.

"Yes—here—here we are!" his comrade panted. "My soul an' body—what a tramp! I'm near dead! Wait a minute, Eleazer. Let's take 'count of stock an' decide how we're goin' to proceed. We've got to make a plan."

"But we've made a plan a'ready. After you've knocked at the door an' gone in—"

"I knocked an' gone in?"

"Yes, yes," Elisha repeated. "After that, you'll sorter state the case to Marcia, 'xplainin' why we've come an' everythin'—"

"An' what'll you be doin' meantime?" Eleazer inquired, wheeling sharply.

"Me? Why, I'll be waitin' outside, kinder loiterin' 'till it's time for me to go in—don't you see?"

"I don't. I think 'twould be better was you to go ahead an' pave the way for me. That's how it's done in plays. Some kinder unimportant person goes first an' afterward the hero comes in."

"So you consider yourself the hero of this show, do you?" commented Eleazer sarcastically.

"Ain't I?"

"Wal, you don't 'pear to me to be. Who egged you on an' marched you here—answer me that? If you ain't the most ungrateful cuss alive! I've a big half mind to go back home an' leave you to do your arrestin' alone."

"Don't do that, Eleazer, don't do that!" Elisha begged. "Don't go home an' leave me—now—at the last minute."

"Very well," Eleazer agreed magnificently. "Then I'll remain an' give you my moral support."

Elisha got up and, dragging one foot after the other, moved toward the house.

"Now knock," commanded the dictator.

Tremulously Elisha tapped on the door.

No answer came.

"Knock, I tell you! That ain't knockin'. Give the door a good smart thump so'st folks'll hear it an' be made aware somethin' important's goin' on. I'll show you."

Eleazer gave the door a spirited bang.

"Law, Eleazer! A rap like that would wake the dead," Elisha protested. "I hear somebody. Stand by me, Eleazer. Where are you goin'? Come back here, can't you? You promised—"

"I didn't promise to go in first. You was to do that," Eleazer called from his vantage ground round the corner.

"But—but—" Elisha whimpered.

The door swung open and Marcia stood upon the sill.

"Why, Elisha!" she exclaimed. "How you startled me. Come in. You're all dressed up, aren't you? Have you been to a funeral?"

"No. I—we—"

The sheriff cleared his throat.

"Me an' Eleazer—" he began.

"Eleazer? Did he come with you?"

Elisha nodded.

"Isn't he coming in?"

"Yes—yes. He's comin' presently."

"Well, sit down and tell me the news."

His dignity, his pomposity put to rout Elisha, feeling very small indeed, backed into the nearest chair.

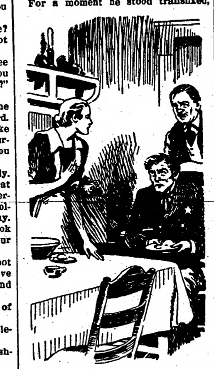
"You won't mind if I go on with my baking, will you?" Marcia said, bustling toward the stove. "I'm makin' dried apple turnovers. They'll be done in a second and you shall have one. I guess a nice hot apple turnover won't go amiss."

With deftness she whisked a triangle of flaky pastry onto a plate and extended it toward her guest.

He sat down with the plate in his lap.

He had taken only an introductory mouthful, however, when the door parted a crack and Eleazer crept cautiously through the opening.

For a moment he stood transfixed, then he burst out in a torrent of reproach.



"Arresting Folks?" Marcia Repeated.

"'Lish Winslow, what on earth are you doin'? Here I've been waitin' outside in the wind, ketchin' my death of cold, an' you settin' here by the stove rockin' an' eatin' pie!"

"I know, Eleazer, I know," Elisha stammered. "It may, mebbe, seem queer to you. I just hadn't got round to the business in hand, that's all. I'm comin' to it in time. I've made a start. I was just leadin' up to it in a sorter tactful way."

"There ain't no way of bein' tactful when you're arrestin' folks. You've got the thing to do an' you have to go straight to it."

"Arresting folks?" Marcia repeated, looking from one man to the other.

"Yes. Since 'Lish is so spineless at his job, I may's well tell you what we come for. Pretty kind of a sheriff he is."

"You better look out, Eleazer Crocker, how you insult an officer of the law," Elisha bawled angrily. "Say a word more an' I'll hail you into court."

"If you don't land me there faster'n you do Heath I shan't worry," jeered Eleazer.

"Heath? Mr. Heath?" Marcia repeated.

"Yes. We come over here this mornin' to place Mr. Stanley Heath under arrest," Eleazer announced.

The woman caught at the edge of the table. Her mind worked rapidly. She must gain time—worm out of them how much they knew.

"Of what are you accusing Mr. Heath?" she demanded.

"Of the Long Island robbery," Eleazer answered.

"You mean to say you think him a thief?"

"We know he's one—leastways Elisha does."

"I—yes! I'm tol'able sure. I have evidence," Elisha replied. "At least I figger I have."

"Shucks, 'Lish!" Eleazer cried. "Where's your backbone? You figger you have! Don't you know it? Ain't you beheld the loot with your own eyes?"

Elisha nodded.

"Then why on earth don't you stand up in your boots an' say so?"

The door opened and Sylvia entered, then stopped, arrested on the threshold by the sound of angry voices.

Inquiringly she looked from Marcia to the men, and back again.

Marcia, with whitened lips but with face grave and determined, remained with her back to the stairway door, her eyes never leaving Elisha Winslow's. There was something in her face Sylvia had never seen there—a light of battle; a fierceness as of a mother fighting for her child; a puzzling quality to which no name could be given.

Suddenly, as the girl studied her, recognition of this new characteristic flashed upon her understanding. It was love!

Anger, perhaps terror, had forced Marcia into betraying a secret no other power could have dragged from her.

"What proof have you?" Marcia demanded.

Elisha shifted from one foot to the other.

With finger pointing dramatically toward the hearth, Elisha strode forward.

Sylvia, however, sprang before him, standing 'twixt him and his goal.

"What a ridiculous story, Mr. Winslow!" she cried. "What a fantastic yarn! Do you imagine for one moment there could be anything hidden under those bricks and Marcia and I not know it? Why, one or the other of us has been in this room every instant since Mr. Heath arrived. When could he get the chance to hide anything? There is nothing here, Mr. Winslow, truly there is nothing. I swear it."

"Nevertheless, let him look, Sylvia. Let them both look."

"Please—please, Marcia—!"

Sylvia was upon her knees now on the hearth, and the men, hesitating to remove her by force, halted awkwardly.

Marcia regarded her first with startled incredulity—then with coldness.

So Sylvia loved Heath, too!

She was fighting for him—fighting with all her feeble strength.

A pang wrenched the older woman's heart.

What if Heath had played a double game—made love to Sylvia as he had made love to her? If so—if the man were a mountebank the sooner they both found it out—the sooner the world knew it, the better.

If, on the other hand, he was innocent, he should have his chance.

The older woman went to the side of the pleading figure.

"Get up, Sylvia," she said. "The sheriff must search. He must do his duty. We have no right to prevent it."

Her face was pale, her lips tightly set.

The brick was lifted out.

A smothered cry escaped Sylvia and was echoed.

"Why—land alive—there's nothin' here!" gasped the sheriff.

"I told you there was nothing!" Sylvia taunted, beginning to laugh hysterically.

"Wal, 'Lish, all I can say is you must either 'a' been wool gatherin' or dreamin' when you conceived this yarn," Eleazer jeered.

"I warn't," hissed Elisha, stung to the quick. "I warn't dreamin'. Them jewels was there. I saw 'em with my own eyes. I swear to heaven I did." He confronted Sylvia. "They was there, young lady, warn't they? You know they was. That's why you was so scairt for me to look. You've seen 'em. Deny it if you dare."

"Of course I deny it."

"Humph! But Marcia won't. You can lie if you want to save the skin of that good-for-nothin' critter upstairs—though what purpose is served by your doin' it I can't see. But Marcia won't. If she says them jewels warn't here I'll believe it. Come now, Marcia. Was there ever diamonds an' things under this brick or warn't there?"

"Yes."

"You saw 'em?"

As if the admission was dragged from her, Marcia formed, but did not utter, the word:

"Yes."

"There! Then I ain't gone daffy! What I said was true," Elisha acclaimed, rising in triumph and snapping his finger at Eleazer.

"The jewels were Mr. Heath's. He hid them for safe keeping."

"A likely story! He stole 'em—that's what he did."

"Prove it," challenged Marcia, with sudden spirit, a spot of crimson burning on either cheek.

"Prove it?" Elisha was taken aback. "Wal, I can't at the moment do that. I can't prove it. But even if I can't, I can make out a good enough case against him to arrest him on suspicion. That's what I mean to do—that's what I come for an' what I'll do 'fore I leave this house."

"Mr. Heath is sick."

"I guess he ain't so sick but what I can go up an' cross-examine him."

"I ask you not to go. I forbid it."

"Law, Marcia!"

"I forbid it," repeated the woman. "Drop this matter for a day or two, Elisha. Mr. Heath shall not leave the house. I promise you that. Leave him here in peace until he is well again. When he is able to—to—go with you I will telephone. You can trust me. When have I ever been false to my word?"

"I don't see why the mischief you're so crazy to stand 'twixt this Heath chap an' justice, Marcia. The feller's a scoundrel. That's what he is—an out an' out scoundrel. Not only is he a thief but he's a married man who's plottin' behind your back to betray you—boastin' openly in telegrams he is."

"What do you mean?"

"I wouldn't like to tell you. In fact I couldn't. 'Twould be repeatin' what was told me in confidence," hedged Elisha, frightened by the expression on the woman's face.

"I have a right to know about the telegrams you mention. Will you tell me or shall I call up the Sawyer Falls operator?"

Bring Woodlands or Sea to the Reach of Flat-Dwellers

The vast ultra-modern flats of Austria and Germany usually have bare, windowless sides which might be used for commercial posters. But an artist has altered all that, says Tit-Bits Magazine. He painted scenic designs on the side of one, and so enraptured were the people that he soon obtained other commissions.

The craze caught on, and now dozens of houses have been decorated with ships, birds, vigorous figures in action, and all kinds of woodland scenes.

Find Out

From Your Doctor if the "Pain" Remedy You Take Is Safe.

Don't Entrust Your Own or Your Family's Well-Being to Unknown Preparations

BEFORE you take any preparation you don't know all about, for the relief of headaches; or the pains of rheumatism, neuritis or neuralgia, ask your doctor what he thinks about it—in comparison with Genuine Bayer Aspirin.

We say this because, before the discovery of Bayer Aspirin, most so-called "pain" remedies were advised against by physicians as being bad for the stomach; or, often, for the heart. And the discovery of Bayer Aspirin largely changed medical practice.

Countless thousands of people who have taken Bayer Aspirin year in and out without ill effect, have proved that the medical findings about its safety were correct.

Remember this: Genuine Bayer Aspirin is rated among the fastest methods yet discovered for the relief of headaches and all common pains . . . and safe for the average person to take regularly.

You can get real Bayer Aspirin at any drug store — simply by never asking for it by the name "aspirin" alone, but always saying BAYER ASPIRIN when you buy.

DOCTORS KNOW

Mothers read this:

THREE STEPS TO RELIEVING CONSTIPATION
I II III
A cleansing dose today; a smaller quantity tomorrow; less each time, until bowels need no help at all.

Why do people come home from a hospital with bowels working like a well-regulated watch?

The answer is simple, and it's the answer to all your bowel worries if you will only realize it: many doctors and hospitals use liquid laxatives.

If you knew what a doctor knows, you would use only the liquid form. A liquid can always be taken in gradually reduced doses. Reduced dosage is the secret of any real relief from constipation.

Ask a doctor about this. Ask your druggist how very popular liquid laxatives have become. They give the right kind of help, and right amount of help. The liquid laxative generally used is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. It contains senna and cascara — both natural laxatives that can form no habit, even in children. So, try Syrup Pepsin. You just take regulated doses till Nature restores regularity.

CONSTIPATED 30 YEARS

"For thirty years I had chronic constipation. Sometimes I did not go for four or five days. I also had awful gas bloating, headaches and pain in the back. Adlerika helped right away. Now I eat sausage, bananas, pie, anything I want and never felt better. I sleep soundly all night and enjoy life." —Mrs. Mabel Schott.

If you are suffering from constipation, sleeplessness, sour stomach, and gas bloating, there is quick relief for you in Adlerika. Many report action in 30 minutes after taking just one dose. Adlerika gives complete action, cleaning your bowel tract where ordinary laxatives do not even reach.

Dr. H. L. Shoub, New York, reports: "In addition to intestinal cleansing, Adlerika checks the growth of intestinal bacteria and colon bacilli."

Give your stomach and bowels a real cleansing with Adlerika and see how good you feel. Just one spoonful relieves GAS and chronic constipation. Sold by all druggists and drug departments.

what Irvin S. Cobb thinks about:

A Texas Front Yard.

HOUSTON, TEX. — Because the Texas rangers merged with a prosaic highway patrol, thereby losing their entity as perhaps the finest fighting force for law enforcement that America ever knew, they're saying romance has suffered a death blow.

But I wouldn't go so far as to say that—not about Texas. There's romance in her scope; raw drama in her business. Superlatives grow on trees out here and distance lives up to its name. We may not always fall in love with the fat lady in the sideshow, but her size commands respect. And sometimes, as in this case, there's beauty along with bulk. Take the famous King ranch—the mightiest domain in the hands of a single family in all the world, probably. There is a saying—and a true one—that it's ninety miles from the front gate to the front yard. Think of trying to shoo the chickens out of that front yard!

Praising Charles Curtis.

DURING his active life, there was a general journalistic tendency to deprecate Charles Curtis' larger achievements and laugh at his little vanities. Now that he's gone, the newspapers, without regard to their politics, are printing tributes to the distinguished career and fine citizenship of this man who went from an Indian lodge to the second highest elective office in our gift.

Since to criticize our leaders is an almost universal instinct, wouldn't it be fine if we reversed the rule about speaking no ill of the dead and praised a deserving fellow-creature while he could hear what we said—but saved up the scoldings until he'd passed on?

I could elaborate on this text, but must stop to try to think up some small gibe at the expense of some prominent man.

The Yellow Peril.

THEY'VE taken the Japanese war scare from the old cedar what-not and shaken the mothballs out of it and are waving it in the breeze as a signal to the citizens of Los Angeles to remove the women and children to a place of safety and a warning to the folks in Seattle to start building street barricades. Thus we have the annual revival of a time-honored custom.

To be sure, there's a racial difference to be reckoned with. We're a breed of opportunists, the Japanese are a breed of fatalists. The American soldier wants to go home when the mess is over and see if he can get his job back from the lad that smuggled into it while he was at the front; the Japanese craves to rejoin his ancestors instead of his family. So naturally a fellow who'd prefer to go on living is at a handicap fighting a gentleman who thinks you're doing him a personal favor by killing him.

But no matter how acute the peril, I decline to retreat to the Ozark mountains until they prove to me that Japanese explosives will explode when desired, or at all.

White Folks' Melodies.

LEAVING California, I said: "I'm fed up on the kinds of singing that you hear so much of out here. No matter what a Mexican song starts out with, it winds up with something about a dove. And the trouble with Hawaiian singers is that they're always telling you good-by but they never go. Thank goodness, I'll soon be listening to the stuff I was raised on—spirituals pouring gloriously forth from velvety Afric throats."

But I hear now the distressing news that, even here in the deep South, some of the black people are getting so self-conscious or something they want to sing the white folks' comparatively thin and pithless hymns instead of their own rich, glowing melodies.

Think of the race that made "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," not wanting to chant it! Think of a day when "Deep River" is forgotten by its very creators! Think of "Joshua Fit the Battle of Jericho" no longer ringing out where the field hands pick the cotton or cut the cane! Think of Little David not being entreated to play on his harp!

Think of that and bust out crying!

Glasses of Eternal Spring.

PRETTY much all over the country there seems to be general complaint about the weather. People are saying the trouble with this winter is that there's so much winter to it.

But there's a philosophical way of regarding climatic unpleasantness. My friend, Ed Borein, the western painter, knew an aged chief on the Crow reservation up in the Northwest who, when the first freeze came, went to the agency and bought a pair of green goggles. There didn't seem to be anything wrong with the old Indian's sight—he had an eye like a captive hawk—so Borein asked questions.

"I'm no longer young," answered the ancient, "and I don't like the snow and ice. Now, wherever I look, I see only green things and it makes springtime in my heart."

Maybe once in awhile we could learn something from the lowly Red man.

Harpooned Hippo Ambushes Boat; Stiff Battle Ensues

Angered because it had been harpooned a few days before, a hippopotamus lay in ambush and suddenly attacked a ferry boat operating on the Mpaologoma swamp, a well-known Uganda waterway, near Nairobi. Charge after charge was made by the infuriated beast, which nearly boarded the vessel, the water being shallow so that it could obtain a foothold. Six natives, armed with spears, fought the invader until the arrival of a European, who shot it, amid songs and cheers from the deck of another vessel speeding to the rescue.

OVEN BAKED BEANS

I SING the BEAN

BARDS of old could have found no more splendid subject to sing than the lowly brown bean, especially if it were served in a low brown pot, fragrant with the mingled goodness of brown sugar and crisp brown bacon! Mingled with it are reminiscences of the songs that the pine trees sing out in Maine woods where beans are eaten by woodsmen who know the worth of long hours of baking in earthen ovens.

Sing the bean then, and repeat a chorus of very good bean dishes which you have tried and found not wanting in universal appeal. Here are two recipes which will start you off singing in tune:

Encore! Encore!

Beans and Cheese Casserole: Dice four slices of bacon and fry crisp. Remove. Drain off most of the fat, add one-fourth cup pecans and brown gently. Add one-third cup diced cheese, the contents of one can of New England oven-baked beans, the bacon dice and salt to taste. Pour into greased individual casseroles. Cut two slices of bacon in halves and place a piece of bacon on top of each. Bake in the oven until the bacon is crisp. This serves four persons.

Baked Beans and Hamburger: Chop one onion, add one-half pound of hamburger steak and brown in two tablespoons of fat. Add the contents of one can of tomato soup and the contents of one can of oven-baked beans. Salt to taste and heat thoroughly. Serve plain or over slices of hot, steamed brown bread. This serves six persons.*

PRUNES Are PRIME

PRUNES are just dried plums? In the current vernacular—that's what you think! So did we until we went into prune ancestry. Any plum can't become a prune. Prune-plums are therefore usually called "fresh prunes."

Luther Burbank, in studying the hybridization of plums, spent ten years and thousands of dollars to produce the best plums for drying purposes—for prunes. For one thing a prune-plum must have the sort of skin which cracks in just the right way when it is immersed in the drying bath.

That Fresh Plum Taste

Canned prunes retain perfectly that fresh plum taste because they are quickly picked and quickly packed. Their rich syrup recommends them, and combined with the tender luscious fruit of the plum—they're something to eat!

It may seem beside the point to discuss ways of preparing them, because they are pretty hard to beat just as they are—for breakfast fruit, for luncheon dessert, or for dinner with roast meats. But if you like to do things with good ingredients—try this

Oregon Foam: Remove pits from one No. 2½ can of fresh prunes, press the prunes through a sieve and return to the juice. Heat to the boiling point and in it dissolve two tablespoons gelatin which has soaked five minutes in one-half cup of cold water. Add two tablespoons lemon juice and set away to cool and stiffen. When beginning to set, add two stiffly-beaten egg whites, and beat mixture until frothy with a Dover beater. Pour into wet molds and chill. Unmold and serve with cream or whipped cream. This serves eight persons.*

County Appeal On Mud Lake To Bring $47,000

Marshall County will receive about $47,000.00 in payment of taxes in the Mud Lake Condemnation proceedings affecting approximately 27,000 acres that were not appealed by private owners, according to Arnold A. Trost, county attorney, following action taken by the county board of commissioners at their regular monthly meeting last week at Warren.

The county commissioners entered into a stipulation with the State of Minnesota and its attorney general Harry H. Peterson agreeing that $54,191.02 be paid as final on the parcels of land on which no private owner has entered an appeal, said Mr. Trost.

Mr. Trost. in behalf of the board, filed an appeal from the awards of the Mud Lake appraisers on all parcels where the awards of the appraisers would not pay the taxes and ditch liens. Several weeks ago, the state agreed to increase the award by 71.2 per cent or a net gain of about $19,000 from the original figure.

The commissioners also are working on an adjustment of taxes basis with private owners who have appealed from the awards and hope to make a satisfactory adjustment so the project will get under way this year.

In the stipulation entered into between the board and Attorney General Peterson, the following statement was made: "This stipulation of settlement is made on the condition that if the state shall conclude not to consumate the condemnation proceedings, this stipulation shall be without prejudice to the right of the state to dismiss the entire proceeding or any part thereof and the state expressly reserves such right. It is expressly agreed that in the event of such dismissal, this stipulation shall create no liability of any kind or nature whatsoever on the part of the state."

County Board To Hear Pension Requests Soon

The Marshall County Board at their regular meeting last week ordered hearing in 2 weeks for the first 65 Old Age Assistance applicants to dispose of their requests for a pension. The date of hearing of the first group of applicants is postponed to this later date to give sufficient time to invertigate the eligibility of the applicants as required by the State Agency.

The Board requested the cooperation of the applicants in the investigarion by asking them to have records available to prove age and citizenship or residence when the investigation is made.

The birth certificate is the best record for tee applicant to prove he has reached the required age. Other documents usually acceptable are baptismal records, insurance policies and naturalization papers when these papers reveal the age of the applicant.

Proof of citizenship is not necessary if the applicant shows he has resided in the United States 25 years. Tax receipts and other official papers may be used to prove this. Proof of residence in the state at least nine years may be proved in the same way. The safest procedure is to have as much evidence as possible available to the investigator when he calls.

In addition to complying with the requirements of age and residence, the basis of grants will be primarily on the relative need of the individual. A just and equitable manner of determining this is being worked out. It now appears, however, that quite a few applicants will have to be excluded from the benefits because other sources will be sufficient for their needs.

The Pension Office had on file approximately 250 applications on March 4. They were held up in taking more applications because of the delay in receiving more blanks from the State Office,

Each applicant will receive written notice in advance of the time of the hearing of his application.

Safetygrams BY FRED W. BRAUN The Safety Man

The desire for reckless speed is still in the minds of many drivers. Speed to get somnwhere at a wild pace, although when you get there you have nothing better to do than turn around and return. Needless, heedless hurry. Cutting all corners, taking all chances that might be taken, beating every light signal and driving like a demon thru crowded streets.

Trying to pass everybody, talking, laughing, eating, drinking and in the next minute a crash.

Death!

What is the sense of it? Who is to blame? Such an occurance or description of speed is a common report in newspapers daily. The American public shrugs its shoulders and reads on.

Not until we arouse a safety consciousness in the minds of the entire public will such recklessness stop.

Removing 300 Deer From Itasca State Park Herd

Starvation and exposure caused the deaths of 20 Itasca Park deer that were sent to University Farm for examination, final reports by Dr. R. Fenstermacher reveal.

Of four deer sent in from other parts of the state, three had died from starvation.

According to Gustav Swanson, biologist of the Division of Game and Fish, the insufficient food supply in Itasca Park is the result of an over-population of deer. Local sportsmen have been providing hay, but it has proved impossible to supply all parts of the park because much of it is inaccessible.

Several truck-loads of Itasca deer have already been trapped and removed to new habitats 30 to 40 miles from the park. The work is in charge of Federal Emergency Conservation Work authorities. The CCC camp at the park has built 15 traps, and a daily catch of 6 to 8 deer is expected.

A new order issued on Monday by the game department states that it will be necessary to remove 300 deer from the park in order to save the herd of 2,500 Itasca park deer from starving.

NATIONAL TOPICS INTERPRETED

By William Bruckart

NATIONAL PRESS BLDG. WASHINGTON, D. C.

Neutrality a Shell

Washington.—Congress, again, has given a fine illustration of how a horse goes up to the jump, then fails to take it. It faltered on the neutrality question. True, congress has re-enacted for another year the neutrality law that was put through under pressure a year ago but it did not have the necessary courage to go into that question and work out anything of a permanent character. The result, I am convinced, is that as soon as there is any excuse whatsoever, neutrality for the United States will be nothing but a shell.

I do not know, nor do I believe anybody can tell at this juncture whether the United States ought to embark on a rigid policy of isolation from affairs of the world but that is a question that is subordinate at this moment. The point is that congress, a year ago, made a great show of neutrality and put on a second stage performance only lately with the same theme song. Since it has backed away from the real issue it begins to appear that the original action was but hollow mockery; that the politicians moved a year ago with the thought in mind that they would not have to go on record so soon and that they could make the country feel it had elected statesmen. But, instead, their course has led them to the point where a decision had to be made—and they have dodged it.

One of the reasons why this neutrality question has become so important is the combination of circumstances that has developed in Europe. Those maneuvers have put our congress on the spot and it, like so many previous times, again has wavered.

It is difficult to forecast what is going to happen in Europe but there are certain signs and portents that may not be ignored. History, as we all know, has a habit of repeating itself and it promises to repeat itself in a hurry this time.

Let us look at the European picture. On the one hand we have an alignment of France and England and probably Russia. On the other, we see Hitlerized Germany, Austria and Italy. There has been nothing more tangible thus far than a baring of fangs. That is, no overt acts have been committed but it always has been the case that the snarling and showing of teeth has provided the setting, the atmosphere, for more serious accusations. It may never happen that Germany or Austria or Italy will take steps which France or Russia could regard as an invasion of national rights and then, again, any one of them at any time may accidentally or deliberately do some minor thing that would provoke hostilities.

* * *

New Alignment

The chief significance of the reported alignment of Italy with Germany and Austria is that the Central Powers, as they stood in 1914, have been augmented by the strength of Fascist Italy. It means that the Germany of 1914 has access to the North sea and the Mediterranean instead of just the North sea as occurred 20 years ago.

Coupled with that fact is the condition of a better defense for the Central Powers. If the agreement between Germany and Italy sticks, Germany has only the western and Russian fronts to maintain. It allows for a more compact military program because, instead of guarding against Italy on the south, Germany has an ally in that direction from which sources of supply can be established.

The fresh understandings worked out between France and England really are nothing more than a restoration of the arrangement that existed in the World war. The British, on the surface at least, have no compact with Russia but the French have a very definite agreement with the Soviet. It seems likely, therefore, that if hostilities should break out again, the British and the Soviet will have no difficulty in establishing a pact of mutual help.

As a sidelight, it seems to me that the new developments rather turn the spotlight on the policies of Pierre Laval, former French foreign minister. M. Laval, it will be remembered, was ousted because of alleged pro-Italian policies. He sought for months to maintain friendship between France and Italy because he feared to do otherwise would result in alignment of Mussolini with Hitler. The bulk of the French parliament disagreed with him, however, and M. Laval was replaced by Foreign Minister Flandin.

Now, Europe has seen the prompt desertion of Mussolini from the French side and his alignment with Hitler.

So, the old picture has been put together again in Europe with the only change being the placement of Italy on the opposite side of the fence from where that nation stood in 1914. But let not the fact that the alignment differs only because of Italy's position be minimized. It is the most important of the combination that has developed in Europe.

France Backs Britain

The new situation, insofar as Great Britain is concerned, means that in case of a clash in the Mediterranean between the forces of Mussolini and the British there will be French support. It means, therefore, that Mussolini hardly dare disturb the concentration of British warships around the Suez. To do so would call down upon his head not only the shells of the British fleet but those of the French as well.

For the French, the revived understanding with Great Britain gives support against the slow flow of Hitler lava into the Rhineland which was demilitarized by the Treaty of Versailles at the end of the World war. The French are very touchy about the Rhineland and any attempt by Germany to fortify that territory makes French nerves very jittery. It is only natural, then, that the French look upon the agreement with London as an assurance of security in event Hitler should strike in the Rhineland.

Through it all, foreign advices indicate that British fists are gradually being doubled up against Hitler. This is true notwithstanding the fact that the new King Edward VIII is trying to be friendly with Germany. Foreign dispatches and private advices explain that there is a notable recurrence among the British of discussion recalling Germany atrocities in the World war. Slowly but surely throughout England the old hatred is arising.

On the northern frontier of Germany there is a new line of steel. The Communistic state of Russia looks with disfavor upon the Nazi. My information is that it would take very little to provoke trouble there.

Altogether, the situation is one where, if a stone rolls down a mountain side, it could very easily become the detonation cap that would explode an ammunition dump.

With these facts in mind, one can understand readily the gravity of the relations between the United States and the rest of the world. One can understand as well why congress was rather anxious to avoid legislation of a broader scope in international affairs than already was operative. Yet, this does not alter the fact that if congress had no intention of establishing a real neutrality policy, it should not have embarked on a course designed to that end. It was either engaging in a game of fooling the public a year ago or it has just now demonstrated a most cowardly attitude.

Roosevelt's Maneuver

Now, to get back home, we observe a maneuver by President Roosevelt to link North and South American nations into a new agreement. While none of our officials will say that this move has any connection with European development, I believe that observers generally are of the opinion that it has an important bearing on the situation beyond the Atlantic. It ought to be helpful in keeping the United States out of that mess or, if the future forces us into it and, in the meantime, there is a sound arrangement worked out between nations of the western hemisphere, their combined strength ought to put an end to European strife more quickly than if those European nations were left to fight it out alone. In other words, if Mr. Roosevelt can work out a binding agreement between all the nations of the western hemisphere, they can exert a tremendous influence.

This influence will carry further than on the homeland of any of the countries now involved in the European case of jitters. It possibly may extend to the point of becoming the balance of power in the settlement of colonial disputes between the central powers and the newly re-established allies. European interests in South America are important and if our South American neighbors have the important weight of the United States on their side, they will be in a position, for the first time, to force proper adjustment of colonial rights in the western hemisphere insofar as those colonial rights are concerned in settlement of European differences.

Saxony Densely Populated

One of the most densely populated regions in Germany is Saxony. The capital and seat of the government is Dresden, an old town situated on the banks of the Elbe. Another famous city of Saxony is Leipzig, known for its semiannual industrial fairs and as a renowned music center. It was in Leipzig that Bach wrote many of his masterpieces.

Wood for Guitars

The sides and back of guitars are usually made of maple, ash, service or cherry, not infrequently adorned with inlays of rosewood or other woods. The sound board or face is of deal. Hard woods, such as ebony, beech or pear, are used for the neck and fingerboard. The bridge may be of ebony.

Big Stone—Removal of rough fish from Big Stone lake has been delayed because of the lateness of the season, and it is unlikely that anything will be done until next fall. George Weaver, superintendent of fisheries for the game and fish division of the state, said the Big Stone lake is carp-infested and that ultimate removal of rough fish is essential.

Jackson—After deliberating less than five and one-half hours, the jury hearing his case found Floyd Strain, former convict of Milbank, S. D., guilty of a first degree robbery charge growing out of the $1,400 machinegun holdup of the First State Bank of Okabena in 1933. He immediately was sentenced to serve not to exceed 80 years in a penal institution.

Fairmont—With sirens screaming and bells clanging the Fairmont fire department pell-mellied toward the home of Mrs. G. H. Jorgensen. Half way there, the motor truck wheezed and stopped. Somebody had stolen the gasoline from the vehicle in the fire station which is in the same building as police headquarters. The Jorgenson home suffered considerable damage.

Hastings—Henry G. Young, Minneapolis attorney, started action in Dakota county District Court at Hastings for return of $5,000,000 in processing taxes to retail meat dealers of the state. The $5,000,000, Young said, is in impounded processing taxes paid back to Swift & Company and Armour & Company, following the Supreme Court decision holding the AAA invalid.

St. James—J. J. Prentice, superintendent of the Omaha road's western division, said blame for a collision of two freight trains near Jordan February 17 which cost the lives of four trainmen apparently rested on the crew of the stalled train. His statement followed two days of hearings. The accident occurred when a double header freight, speeding down a slight grade at approximately 50 miles an hour, crashed into the rear of a stalled freight about four miles from Jordan.

Firestone TIRES RUN up to 28° COOLER

THIS IS WHY THEY GIVE YOU More Dependable Service AND SAVE YOU MONEY

Every truck operator knows that internal friction causes heat and heat is the greatest destroyer of tire life. The only way to counteract friction and heat is by Gum-Dipping, the Firestone patented process which soaks the cords in liquid rubber, saturating and coating each tiny cotton fiber and strand within the cord, counteracting friction and heat at their very source. As a result of this patented process, Firestone Tires run up to 28° cooler than tires built without Gum-Dipped Cords.

This is why Firestone Tires are used by thousands and thousands of truck operators from coast to coast, including the largest transportation fleets. Don't Entrust Your Own or Your Family's Well-Being to Unknown Preparations

BEFORE you take any preparation you don't know all about, for the relief of headaches; or the pains of rheumatism, neuritis or neuralgia, ask your doctor what he thinks about it—in comparison with Genuine Bayer Aspirin.

We say this because, before the discovery of Bayer Aspirin, most so-called "pain" remedies were advised against by physicians as being bad for the stomach; or, often, for the heart. And the discovery of Bayer Aspirin largely changed medical practice.

Countless thousands of people who have taken Bayer Aspirin year in and out without ill effect, have proved that the medical findings about its safety were correct.

Remember this: Genuine Bayer Aspirin is rated among the fastest methods yet discovered for the relief of headaches and all common pains . . . and safe for the average person to take regularly.

You can get real Bayer Aspirin at any drug store—simply by never asking for it by the name "aspirin" alone, but always saying BAYER ASPIRIN when you buy.

SYNOPSIS

The youthful and comely "Widder" Marcia Howe has as her guest her late husband's niece, Sylvia Hayden. A stranger, exhausted, finds his way to Marcia's home. Secretly, he asks her to hide a package containing jewelry. She does so. Elisha Winslow, town sheriff, brings news of a jewel robbery nearby. The stranger gives his name as Stanley Heath. Sylvia discovers the jewels, and naturally believes Heath is a robber, but, for Marcia's sake, decides to say nothing. Marcia feels she has altogether too deep an interest in her guest, but is powerless to overcome it. Heath wires "Mrs. S. C. Heath," New York, saying he is safe. He also orders a man named Currier to come at once. Sylvia, in her room, bedecks herself with the jewels. At Marcia's approach she hides them there. Heath asks Marcia to bring them to him. They are gone! He makes light of the loss. Sylvia restores the jewels to their original hiding place. Elisha Winslow discovers them and has no doubt they are the stolen gems, and Heath is a thief. Leaving the jewels, he makes plans for arresting Heath. Currier arrives. Marcia overhears Heath describe how he acquired the gems, and is forced to believe him guilty of theft. At Heath's suggestion, Currier investigates the hiding place—and finds the gems! He returns to New York with them, but his references to "Mrs. Heath" have convinced Marcia her tender dream has been a foolish one. Elisha and Eleazer come to arrest Heath. Marcia is indignant, and unwittingly reveals to Sylvia the secret of her love. The jewels, of course, are not to be found.

"Oh, for heaven's sake don't do that," Elisha pleaded. "Artie Nickerson would be ragin' mad did he find I'd told you. If you must know what the message was, I can repeat it near 'nough, I reckon. It ran somethin' like this:

"'Safe on Cape with my lady. Shall return with her later.'"

"And that was all?" inquired Marcia calmly.

"All! Ain't that enough?" Elisha demanded.

As she vouchsafed no reply he presently continued:

"I don't want you should think I told you this, Marcia, with any unfriendly motive. It's only that those of us who've seen you marry one worthless villain don't want you should marry another. Jason was a low down cuss. You know that well's I."

The woman raised her hand to check him.

"I'm aware 'tain't pleasant to hear me say so out loud, but it's God's truth."

"Marcia!" Sylvia burst out.

"Hush, dear. We'll talk of this later. Elisha, I think I must ask you and Eleazer to go now."

"You ain't goin' to tell me where the jewels are?"

"I don't know where they are."

"Nor nothin' 'bout—'bout the telegram."

"Nothing except to thank you for your kind intentions and say you quoted it quite correctly. I sent it for Mr. Heath myself. 'My Lady,' as you have apparently forgotten, is the name of Mr. Heath's boat."

"My land! So 'tis," faltered Elisha. "I'm almighty sorry, Marcia—I ask your pardon."

"It's all right. Just leave us now, please."

The door banged behind the discomfited officials.

The torrent of words Sylvia had until now held in check broke from her:

"Was it true, Marcia—what they said about Uncle Jason I mean? Was it true?"

"I'm afraid so, dear."

"But you never told me; and you never told Mother, either. Of course I see why. You didn't want her to know because it would have broken her heart. I hate him! I hate him for making you unhappy and spoiling your life!"

"Hush child. Jason has not spoiled my life," contradicted Marcia with a grave, sad smile.

"But he has scarred it—dashed to pieces all the dreams you started out with—those beautiful dreams a girl has when she is young. I know you had such fancies once, for you are the sort who would. And Jason came and trampled on them—"

"He made me see life as it was. Perhaps it was better I should."

"Was Jason as bad as they said, Marcia? Ah, you don't have to answer. There is no need for you to try to reconcile your desire to spare me—spare him—with the truth. He was as bad—probably much worse. Dear, dear Marcia." Impulsively Sylvia bent her lips to the hands so tightly clasped in hers. "I cannot imagine," she rushed on, "why, when one of my family had made you as wretched as he did, you should have wanted another in the house. Had I suffered so I should never have wished to lay eyes on any more Howes as long as I lived."

"I have tried not only to forgive but to forget. I have closed the door on the past and begun a new life."

"And now into it has come this Stanley Heath," the girl said.

For the fraction of a second Marcia did not reply; then almost inaudibly she murmured:

"Yes."

Sylvia slipped one of her strong young arms about the bowed shoulders.

"It just seems as if I could not bear it," she burst out passionately.

"Silvia, look at me. Tell me the truth. Do you, too, love Stanley Heath? Was that the reason you fought against Elisha's finding the jewels? Tell me. I must know."

"No," she answered without hesitation. "At first he did fascinate me. I changed my mind, though, later on. Not because on acquaintance he became less charming. It wasn't that. If anything, he became more so. I just—changed my mind. As for the jewels, I could not bear to let that little runt of a sheriff win out. You see, I thought the gems were there under the brick and that when you urged him to search, you did not know it.

"I had known all along they were in the house, for I stumbled upon them by accident one day when I was here alone; but I had no idea you had. I truly believed Mr. Heath had hidden them beneath the hearth, and I was determined Elisha should not find them."

"You think Mr. Heath took the jewels?" asked Marcia, slowly.

"Certainly I do. Don't you?"

"No."

"But, Marcia, can't you see how plain it all is? I know it is terrible for you, dear. It almost breaks my heart. It is an awful thing to believe of anybody—harder still, of a person one loves. Nevertheless, we must face the facts. People do not carry such things about with them—especially men. He came by them in no honest way, you may be sure of that. He is guilty, Marcia—guilty."

"I do not believe it," was the stubborn protest.

"I realize, dear, it is hard for you to own it," soothed Sylvia. "We hate to admit the faults of those we—we—care for. Still, nothing is to be gained by remaining blind to them. Perhaps Mr. Heath was horribly tempted to commit this sin. We do not know. We are not his judges. The thing for us to do is to help him out of the mess he is in. Aid him to escape."

"Believing him guilty—you would do that?"

"Surely I would."

"You mean you would help him to evade the law? The punishment such wrongdoing merits?"

"Yes. To give him a sporting chance, the start of those who are after him. You love Stanley Heath. Don't you want to see him go free?"

"Not if he is guilty."

"Well, nobody is going to round up Mr. Heath if I can prevent it," asserted Sylvia, throwing back her head. "If you won't help him get away, I will. He must go in the boat—now—today."

"The boat has gone. Mr. Currier arrived this morning after you had gone and took the boat back to New York with him."

"And the jewels?"

"Yes, the jewels, too."

"Humph! So that's where they are!"

"Yes."

"Pretty cute of him to make so neat a get-away! What sort of man was he? A gentleman, like Mr. Heath?"

The older woman colored.

"Well, no. At least he—he—. Oh, he was polite and had a nice manner—a quiet voice—"

"But he was different from Mr. Heath—an inferior—one who took orders," interrupted Sylvia. "In other words, he is the hands and Mr. Heath the brains of the team."

"How can you, Sylvia?"

"Because I must, Marcia—because we must both look this affair in the face. Confess the circumstances are suspicious."

"They seem to be," she owned with reluctance.

"Have you considered them?" Sylvia inquired.

Marcia drew her hand across her forehead.

"I—I—yes. I have thought them over. I don't understand them at all. Nevertheless, I do not believe Stanley Heath is guilty," was the proud retort.

"You are making a great mistake, if you will pardon me for saying so," Sylvia responded gently. "You are deliberately closing your eyes and mind to facts that later are bound to cause you bitter unhappiness. Let alone the man's guilt. He has a wife. You seem to forget that. As Elisha Winslow remarked, you have already been miserable once. Why be so a second time? Help Stanley Heath to get out of Wilton and forget him."

"I cannot do either of those things. In the first place, I have given my word to hand Mr. Heath over to the authorities. As for forgetting him—why ask the impossible?"

Sylvia's patience gave way.

"Go your own way then," she snapped. "Go your own way and if by and by you regret it—as you surely will—do not blame me. Don't blame me, either, if I do not agree with you. Stanley Heath shall never remain here and be betrayed to the law. Stick to your grim old puritanism if you must. I'll help him get away."

She started toward the stairway.

"Sylvia, come back here!" Marcia cried.

"I shall not come back."

Marcia rushed after her, but it was too late.

Sylvia was gone.

* * * * * * *

Stanley Heath was lying with expectant face turned toward the door when Sylvia entered.

"What's the rumpus?" he demanded.

"I guess you know. There is no use mincing matters or beating about the bush. The jewels have gone and you must go, too."

The man looked dumfounded.

"Don't misunderstand me, please," Sylvia rushed on. "I'm not blaming you—nor judging you. I don't know why you took them. You may have been tempted beyond your strength That is none of my business."

"You believe I stole them?"

"Certainly I do."

"Suppose I didn't?"

"I expected you'd say that," was the calm retort. "Let it go that way if you prefer. I don't mind. What I want to do is to help you to get away."

"Even if I am guilty."

"Yes. I just can't bear to have that mean little sheriff who's after you catch you."

"What's that?"

"That wretched Elisha Winslow who came here this morning with Eleazer Crocker tagging at his heels. In some way they had found out about the jewels and where you had hidden them. They wanted to come upstairs and arrest you post haste; but Marcia wouldn't allow it."

"Marcia heard the story, too?"

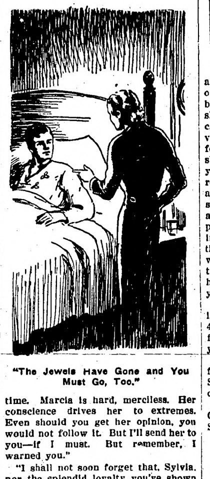
"Of course."

"Poor Marcia!"

"You may well say poor Marcia," Sylvia echoed sarcastically. "You have made her most unhappy. Oh, Mr. Heath, Marcia has not had the sort of life that I told you she had. She has been wretched—miserable. Go away before you heap more suffering upon her. I'll help you get out of town. I am sure we can devise a plan."

"Wait just a moment. What does Marcia say? I think I'd better talk with her first."

"Don't! It will only be a waste of time. Marcia is hard, merciless. Her conscience drives her to extremes. Even should you get her opinion, you would not follow it. But I'll send her to you—if I must. But remember, I warned you."



"The Jewels Have Gone and You Must Go, Too."

"I shall not soon forget that, Sylvia, nor the splendid loyalty you've shown today. I shall always remember it. Whatever happens, please realize that I am grateful," Heath said earnestly. "Run along now, and fetch Marcia."

It was some moments before Marcia answered the summons and when at last she came, it was with downcast eyes and evident reluctance.

"Tell me, please, exactly what happened down stairs." Heath smiled.

She related the incident tersely; without comment.

Stanley Heath, scrutinizing her with keen, appraising eyes, could not but note the pallor of her cheeks, the unsteadiness of her lips, the nervous clasping and unclasping of her hands.

"And that is all?" he inquired when convinced she had no intention of speaking further.

"That is all."

"Thank you. Now what do you think it best for me to do? I should like your opinion."

"But how can I give a just opinion? I cannot judge," she burst out as if goaded beyond her patience. "I know none of the facts."

A radiance, swift as the passage of a meteor, flashed across Stanley Heath's face and was gone.

"Suppose you yourself had taken these jewels and were placed in this dilemma?" pressed he.

"The case would not be similar at all."

"Why not?"

"Because—because I should be guilty."

"You mean—you think—"

"I do not believe you took the jewels," was the quiet answer.

"Marcia! Marcia! Why don't you believe I took them? Have I ever told you I did not take them? Ever led you to suppose me innocent?"

"You have never told me anything about it."

The man restrained an impulse to imprison her hands in his.

"Suppose I did take them?" he went on in an even, coolly modulated voice. "Suppose the case stands exactly as this shrewd-eyed Wilton sheriff suspects it does? What am I to do?"

He saw the color drain from her face.

"I only know what I should do, were I in your place. I should go through with it—clear my soul of guilt."

"And afterward?"

"Start over again."

"That would be very difficult. The stigma of crime clings to a man. My life would be ruined were I to pursue such a course."

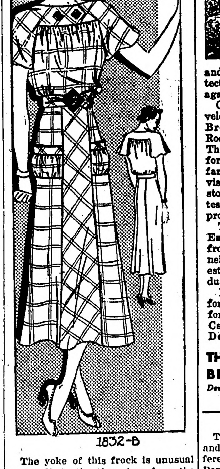
Alluring Daytime Frock With Distinctive Yoke



1832-B

The yoke of this frock is unusual and a distinctive departure from the obvious round or squared-off affair, because it extends out over the shoulders and forms flaring little caps—caps which conceal two inverted pleats and which are transformed into lovely loose raglan sleeves. The blouse gathers at the yoke and waist in front and back, rendering fullness and a soft drapey appearance. The twin panels in the skirt give you height, and the skirt an added swirl. Two huge gathered pockets in unison with the blouse are interesting features and very practical. Make a self-fabric belt trimmed with a diamond shaped buckle and two harmonizing buttons, and notice how smart and up to the minute your frock will be.

Barbara Bell Pattern No. 1832-B is available in sizes 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44, and can be procured for fifteen cents. Size 36 requires 4⅞ yards of 35-inch material.

SQUIRREL DESERTS DIET OF NUTS FOR ICE CREAM

Austin.—A squirrel with propensities for ice cream has been discovered at Austin, and after this it will be hard to get the animal back to a common diet of nuts. A businessman and his wife of that city took home a quart of ice cream during the cold days. They ate a part of it, then placed the lid on the carton and packed it in a snowdrift to keep it frozen until dinner time. Later in the afternoon the man's wife looked out in the yard and saw a squirrel busy at the carton. It had pulled the cover off, and with both paws was passing ice cream to its mouth, as fast as it could lick the stuff down. But the cream was cold. The little fellow would rub his hands together to warm them up and then go to eating again. His paws got colder and colder. He sat up, and held his paws in his fur coat and tuck them under his armpits and sat, watching the carton, to see it was not stolen. When the job was finished the squirrel licked its chops and went away. Not a drop of the ice cream was left.

INDIAN SHOWS UP WHITE BROTHERS FOR HONESTY

New Ulm.—A pair of binoculars lost in the wide open spaces of Alberta can generally be given up by the owner as gone for good, and when Dr. Albert Fritsche, New Ulm physician, suffered that experience he felt as might be expected and took the loss philosophically. Dr. Fritsche trekked northward last fall in quest of caribou, mountain sheep bear and other big game, penetrating the primeval wilderness beyond Jasper Park, Alberta, Canada. Two days "out from civilization", Dr. Fritsche discovered his field glasses, an expensive pair, were missing. Last week, months after his return, he received a letter from J. F. Smith, grocer and provisioner at Hilton Trail, Alberta, advising that an Indian trapper had found a pair of binoculars, and wondering whether anyone in Dr. Fritsche's party had lost them. The Indian had turned the field glasses over to the storekeeper, in spite of the fact that there were no means of identification on them and they were found in a region where there was no human habitation for miles around. Dr Fritsche received his glasses, and the Indian a generous reward for his extreme honesty.

SNOW THROWN BY ROTARY CRUSHES AUTOMOBILE TOPS

St. James.—Curious citizens of St. James, gathered to see the first M. & St. L. train to reach the town for over a month on March 8, were greeted with a bombardment of snow which did damage amounting to hundreds of dollars. Traveling at a rate of three miles an hour, the railroad rotary came steadily along. It could plainly be seen how the snow was thrown out by the rotary, but it was not until the falling snow crashed through automobile tops, crushed fenders and hoods and damaged half a dozen cars that the people realized that falling snow is heavy. Mrs. Ben Bertilsen was cut about the face and leg by broken glass as the heavy snow did $55 damage to the car she was in. The new car of Manfred Anderson suffered damage to the fenders, radiator shell, and hood. An old roadster driven by Albert Babolian suffered the complete destruction of its top as the heavy snow crashed through. John Johnson's car was damaged when wood support stays for the top were crushed. Other cars were damaged by broken glass, crashed fenders and tops.

Safetygrams BY FRED W. BRAUN The Safety Man

Correct posture is closely associated with good health.

If the case of a watch is badly bent it throws the mechanism out of line and it will not run properly. If the bony framework of the body is misshaped or the muscles have not been trained to support the body in a correct position, the internal organs are thrown out of position and cannot do their work properly.

Stand straight. Stand as tall as possible without rising on your toes. Keep your head up, chin in, shoulders squared evenly chest out, spine as straight as possible without strain. Breathe deeply.

Sit erect. Strive to maintain the same position of the trunk as when standing straight. If necessary to bend over your work, bend at the hips not in the middle of the back or shoulders.

While most of Minnesota wallows in 10-foot snow banks, it is summer in the Willmar State Asylum, where inmates have grown a lemon tree to a height of six feet. There are six good sized lemons on the tree which will ripen soon. Bus drivers on the route from the Twin Cities to Bemidji are accused of offering their innocent passengers a small wager that a deer will be sighted from the bus, a "cinch" bet, since it is extremely rare that a deer is not sighted within a distance of six miles from Itasca State Park; the deer do not seem to be bothered by the bus siren any more, but leave the road side in a hurry if the bus stops Walter Glen, Badger, was killed when he was crushed between two sno wplow outfits on Roseau county roads. MINNESOTA NEWS

Clarissa—The Farmers State Bank is installing a complete burglar alarm system.

Duluth—One of the Great Lakes' most famous vessels, the whaleback ship Christopher Columbus, is being dismantled at the Manitowoc, Wis., shipyards after 44 years of service.

Minneapolis—Income of the state liquor control commission showed a net increase of $61,577.68 for the first two months of 1936 over the corresponding period in 1935, David R. Arundel, commissioner, said.

St. Paul—Minnesota farmers received $32,817,104 in AAA rental and benefits from the time the program started in 1933 to the end of last year, including $26,890,577 in corn-hog payments, $4,900,723 in wheat, $932,722 in sugar beets and $93,080 in tobacco.

Minneapolis—Engaged in a survey of mortality among pheasants resulting from the extreme cold weather of January and February, the state game and fish division urged persons finding dead game birds to communicate with their local game wardens. The wardens will ship birds in good state of preservation to University Farm for examination.

Hopkins — Moderate temperatures thawed the surface but seven feet below at the county buildings on the Hopkins fairgrounds, a six-inch water main froze up tight. W. E. Duckett, county highway engineer, sent a pipe-thawing crew to the building. He explained the thaw acted on the icecream freezer principle, driving the frost deep into the ground.

St. James—Mrs. Susan Doolittle, who came to Minnesota in a covered wagon from New York 75 years ago, celebrated her 103d birthday anniversary here. In good health despite her advanced age, Mrs. Doolittle was feted by the Women's Relief Corps at a birthday party. Among those present were three great-great-grandchildren, and several great-grandchildren.

Minneapolis—Addressing leaders of civic and sportsmen's organizations who met to discuss plans for the third annual Northwest Sportsmen's show at the Minneapolis auditorium April 11 to 18, George H. Bradley, director of the Minnesota tourist bureau, urged citizens to do their utmost to develop the state as a center for recreation and vacation activities.

St. Cloud—A hunger strike among the 1,100 inmates of St. Cloud reformatory was broken up when officials set out to crush the rebellion against prison regulations by placing the three ringleaders in solitary confinement. The rest of the inmates except for about 200 who took no part in the strike, were closely guarded in their cells and fears that the demonstration might develop into a riot subsided.

St. Paul—Younger Republicans of Minnesota received an official call for a state convention to be held in St. Paul, Saturday, March 28. The session will be sponsored by the Young Republican League of Minnesota and will bring delegates from counties throughout the state. State and district officers will be selected and the formulation of an affirmative policy on matters of vital importance will be discussed.

Duluth—Heavy ice formations ranging in thickness from 12 to 35 inches along shores of Lake Superior in Minnesota, Wisconsin and Michigan are reported by the Duluth branch of the hydrographic office. In the Duluth-Superior harbor the ice averages about 35 inches, extending beyond vision on the lake is ice 25 inches in thickness. The ice is 24 inches thick at Two Harbors and 30 inches at Grand Marais.

Tracy—A mother and her son and daughter were burned to death here when fire swept their home. The victims were Mrs. Andrew Stahowiak, 50; her daughter, Victoria, 30, and her son, Frank, 21, publisher of the Tracy Daily Reminder. Andrew Stahowiak escaped with serious burns. Mrs. Stahowiak was trapped with her children in their second floor bedroom when she returned to rescue them. She had followed her husband to the door after they had been awakened by the crackling flames.

St. Paul—A double job was started by Minnesota's old age pension distribution organization. Besides the launching of the program for administering the law, which went into effect March 1, there still is the problem of overcoming federal objections, which have held up federal funds of from $5,000,000 to $4,000,000. Without the federal aid, the amount available for pensions would be cut approximately in half. Leading the effort to settle matters with the federal social security board is Governor Olson now vacationing at Tucson, Ariz. The governor conferred with Washington by long distance telephone to find out just what the objections are based on, and he is endeavoring to work out a solution.

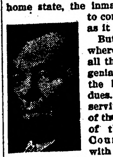
St. Paul—Sharply slashing into relief staffs of the state and of counties, several hundred persons who have been connected with relief agencies in Minnesota are about to be dropped, L. P. Zimmerman, state administrator, announced. Economy is the order of the day as a result of two developments: Refusal of the federal government to help further with direct relief, thus throwing the burden on the state and on counties and turning over to counties of the responsibility of administering relief.

what Irvin S. Cobb thinks about:

Making Money in "Stir"

BEVERLY HILLS, CALIF.—Things certainly are lovely for the boys in the big stone hide-a-wee homes, is it not so?

At San Quentin here in California, chosen groups turning out counterfeit money and never having to worry about getting in jail, since they are already in. And a nice jolly strike on at Alcatraz. And in my old home state, the inmates just seeming to come and go at will, as it were.



Irvin S. Cobb

But in Illinois is where the chaps enjoy all the benefits of congenial society without the bother of paying dues. It must be grand, serving as a member of the house committee of the Joliet Indoor Country club, what with crap games and poker parties and liquor made right there on the premises and shots in the arm at the low rate of one dollar per shot.

The day is at hand when "prison break" in the headlines won't mean that some of the fellows on the inside are trying to get out but that some of the fellows on the outside are trying to get in; and who could blame them?

* * *

The Yellow Peril's Peril

AT THIS moment the question before the house is whether it is more perilous to be a statesman in Japan and give offense to the soldiers or a soldier in America and give offense to the statesmen?

Howsomever, at the risk of being penalized for punning, this innocent bystander ventures the prediction that amongst us there won't be any more of these summary removals for the Ha-good of the service, as it were.

Because when something happens off or on a military post to make Tom Blanton, the blood-sweating behemoth of Texas Democracy, line up with a lot of Republicans—well, I never thought I'd live to see the day. I don't believe Uncle Tom did, either. I'll bet nobody is more surprised than he is.

Abolishing Potlatches

AT LAST accounts, the Canadian parliament had a bill before it to abolish potlatches. When an Indian gets prosperous, he gives a party, with free food and drink for all, and whatever he has left over he bestows upon the guests and so winds up beggared but happy. That's a potlatch. Although at present confined to the Indians, it's not their own idea. They borrowed it from some of the early settlers. It's an old Scotch custom.

Tracing the genesis of traditional things is interesting. I thought the famous motto of the Northwest Mounted police had originated within the force until once when I tackled some native smoking tobacco at a trading post in upper Ontario. As soon as I recovered consciousness I knew whence came the slogan, "Always Gets Its Man!" That was years ago, but I still have dizzy spells in humid weather.

Speaking of borrowing or rather of trading, we could make a profitable deal—from our standpoint—by swapping Canada a great gross of parole boards and overly sentimental governors and judges who put technicalities before common sense and common justice for about half a dozen of their trial courts and one or two square jawed prison wardens.

'Tis Holdout Time

IT IS the gladsome season when last year's stars swear they'll never put on uniforms again unless they get better contracts; while the managers just as loudly declare the boys will accept what's offered or stay out of the game forevermore. Through anxious weeks each group proclaims that, from the position thus taken, it will never, never abate one jot or tittle.

But when the first robin starts north and the last training squad starts south, something always happens. One side decides to abate quite a few of the jots. And the other side says, "Oh shuckins, after all, what's a tittle more or less between friends?"

So this spring's hold-outs become this fall's pennant-winners, or otherwise as the case may be, and frequently is. And behind the scenes, everything in either championship team will be just as peaceful as a cage full of panthers until this time next year.

Which Is the Leisure Class?

WHEN Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan said any American family that kept a maid belonged to the leisure class, he touched a responsive chord in the bosom of this household, only he got the proposition mixed as it applied to our little home-nest.

'Twas a maid we had for a short spell who really qualified. Possibly we didn't give satisfaction. Anyhow, one evening she took umbrage and some guest towels and a ham and one thing and another and silently stole away. But looking back, I can't recall anybody else who could be so leisurely and so classy, both at once.

We are wondering now what class we belong to on the present maid's night out. Probably Mr. Morgan isn't worried in that regard. He could ask the second man to stick around. We haven't a second man, though—haven't even worked up to the first one yet.

Kidnaping Is Not Entirely an American Crime, Nor New

The crime of kidnaping is not a new one or confined to this country, though the organization of kidnaping gangs for profit has been more greatly developed here in recent years than anywhere else. It is a curious fact that the word "kidnaping" came into use not in America but in England about 250 years ago and referred to the business of stealing young people in that country to provide indentured servants or laborers (virtually slaves) for the American plantations.

In Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," written in 1684, occurs the sentence, "Thou practisest the craft of a kidnaper; thou gatherest up women and children and carriest them into a strange country, to the weakening of my master's kingdom." Maj. Arthur Griffith's "Mysteries of Police and Crime" states: "Child stealing has always been a profitable trade, practiced at the instance of greedy relatives anxious to remove a rightful heir; full-grown youths of muscle and sinew were entrapped in great numbers during the first half of the Eighteenth century to be sold as white slaves for the American plantations."—Detroit News.

GAS, GAS ALL THE TIME, CAN'T EAT OR SLEEP

"The gas on my stomach was so bad I could not eat or sleep. Even my heart hurt. A friend suggested Adlerika. The first dose I took brought me relief. Now I eat as I wish, sleep fine and never felt better."—Mrs. Jas. Filler.

Adlerika acts an BOTH upper and lower bowels while ordinary laxatives act on the lower bowel only. Adlerika gives your system a thorough cleansing, bringing out old, poisonous matter that you would not believe was in your system and that has been causing gas pains, sour stomach, nervousness and headaches for months.

Dr. H. L. Shoub, New York, reports: "In addition to intestinal cleansing, Adlerika greatly reduces bacteria and colon bacilli."

Give your stomach and bowels a REAL cleansing with Adlerika and see how good you feel. Just one spoonful relieves GAS and chronic constipation. Sold by all druggists and drug departments.

SYNOPSIS

The youthful and comely "Widder" Marcia Howe has as her guest her late husband's niece, Sylvia Hayden. A stranger, exhausted, finds his way to Marcia's home. Secretly, he asks her to hide a package containing jewelry. She does so. Elisha Winslow, town sheriff, brings news of a jewel robbery nearby. The stranger gives his name as Stanley Heath. Sylvia discovers the jewels, and naturally believes Heath is a robber, but, for Marcia's sake, decides to say nothing. Marcia feels she has altogether too deep an interest in her guest, but is powerless to overcome it. Heath wires "Mrs. S. C. Heath," New York, saying he is safe. He also orders a man named Currier to come at once. Sylvia, in her room, bedecks herself with the jewels. At Marcia's approach she hides them there. Heath asks Marcia to bring them to him. They are gone! He makes light of the loss. Sylvia restores the jewels to their original hiding place. Elisha Winslow discovers them and has no doubt they are the stolen gems, and Heath is a thief. Leaving the jewels, he makes plans for arresting Heath. Currier arrives. Marcia overhears Heath describe how he acquired the gems, and is forced to believe him guilty of theft. At Heath's suggestion, Currier investigates the hiding place—and finds the gems! He returns to New York with them, but his references to "Mrs. Heath" have convinced Marcia her tender dream has been a foolish one. Elisha and Eleazer come to arrest Heath. Marcia is indignant, and unwittingly reveals to Sylvia the secret of her love. The jewels, of course, are not to be found. To Sylvia Marcia admits she loves Heath and has faith in his innocence. She tells him she believes him innocent, but urges him, if he is guilty, to confess. He admits nothing.

"Not your real life. You would, of course, lose standing among your supposed friends; but you would not lose it among those whose regard went deeper. Even if you did—what would it matter?"

"But to be alone, friendless! Who would help me piece together the mangled fragments of such a past—for I should need help; I could not do it alone? Do you imagine that in all the world there would be even one person whose loyalty and affection would survive so acid a test? Do you know of anyone?"

She leaped to her feet.

"Why do you ask me?" she demanded, the gentleness of her voice chilling to curtness. "You have such a helpmate near you—or should have."

"I don't understand," pleaded the man, puzzled by her change of mood.

"Perhaps we'd better not go into that now," was her response. "I must go."

"Wait just a moment."

"I cannot. I must get dinner."

"Never mind the dinner! Sometimes there are things more important."

"To think of a man saying that!"

The ring of the telephone chimed in with her silvery laughter.

"I'll go, Sylvia," she called with a promptness that indicated the interruption was a welcome one.

"It's long distance," she called to Heath. "Mrs. Heath wishes to speak with you. Slip on your bathrobe and come."

Heath took the receiver from her hand.

"Joan? This certainly is good of you, dear. Yes, I am much better, thank you. Bless your precious heart, you needn't worry. Currier will be back late tonight or early tomorrow morning and he will tell you how well I am progressing. Yes, he has the jewels. Put them in the safe right away, won't you?

"I can't say when I shall be home. Something has come up that may keep me here some time. I cannot explain just now. It is the thing you have always predicted would happen to me sometime. Well, it has happened. Do you get that? Yes, I am caught—hard and fast. It is a bit ironic to have traveled all over the world and then be taken captive in a small Cape Cod village. I'll let you know the first minute I have anything definite to tell.

"Good-by, dear. Take care of yourself. It's done me a world of good to hear your voice."

Heath returned the receiver to its hook and in high spirits strode back into his room.

Marcia's chair was empty.

She was nowhere to be seen.

CHAPTER X

The days immediately following were like an armed truce.

Marcia watched Sylvia. Sylvia watched Marcia. Heath watched them both.

When, however, no further reference to the events of the past week was made, the tension slowly began to lessen, and life at the Howe Homestead took on again its customary aspect.

Stanley Heath, warmly wrapped in rugs, now sat out on the sheltered veranda where he reveled in the sunshine.

Sometimes when he lay motionless in the steamerchair looking seaward beneath the rim of his soft felt hat, or following the circling gulls with preoccupied gaze Marcia, peeping at him from the window wondered of what he was thinking.

That the fancies which intrigued him were pleasant and that he enjoyed his own company there could be no question.

No attitude he might have assumed could have been better calculated to dispel awkwardness and force into the background the seriousness of the two women, whose interests were so inextricably entangled with his own, than the merry, bantering one he adopted when with them.

He was a brilliant talker—one who gave unexpected, original twists to the conversation—twists that taxed one's power of repartee. Here indeed was a hitherto undreamed-of Stanley Heath, a man whose dangerous charms had multiplied a hundredfold and who, if he had captivated Marcia before now riveted her fetters with every word he spoke, every glance he gave her.

She struggled to escape from the snare closing in on her, then finding combat useless, ceased to struggle and let herself drift with the tide.

After all, why not enjoy the present?

In loving this stranger of whom she knew so little, she had set her heart upon a phantom that she knew must vanish. The future, grim with foreboding, was constantly drawing nearer.

There were, alas, but two ways of life—the way of right and the way of wrong, and between them lay no neutral zone. This she acknowledged with her mind. But her rebel heart would play her false, flouting her puritan codes and defying the creeds that conscience dictated.

Meantime while Marcia thus wrestled with the angel of her best self, Sylvia accepted the situation with characteristic lightness. She knew more already about men than did Marcia—much more. Long ago they had ceased to be gods to her. She jested fearlessly with Heath, speaking a language with which he was familiar and one that amused him no end.

Marcia felt jealousy clutching at her heart.

One day, passing through the hall, she saw Sylvia's golden head bent over the table as she dashed off page after page of a closely written letter.

It was a pity the elder woman could not have read that letter, for it would not only have astonished but also have enlightened her and perhaps quieted the beating of her troubled heart.

It was a letter that astonished Sylvia herself. Nevertheless, much as it surprised her, her amazement in no way approached that of young Horatio Fuller when he read it.

Now, Horatio's mother was a woman of colorless, vaguely defined personality indicative of little guile and still less determination. She listened well, never interrupted; never offered comment or advice; never promised anything; and yet when she said, as she invariably did, "I'll talk with your father, dear," there was always infinite comfort in the observation.

That was what she said today after a conversation with Horatio Junior.

Accordingly that evening after Horatio Senior had dined, and dined well, Mrs. Horatio gently imparted to Alton City's leading citizen the intelligence that his son, Horatio Junior, wished to go east; that he was in love; that, in short, he wished to marry.

Horatio Senior raged; he tramped the floor; he heaped on the head of the absent Horatio Junior every epithet of reproach his wrath could devise, the phrases driveling idiot and audacious puppy appearing to afford him the greatest measure of relief.

At last when breathless and panting Horatio Senior, like an alarm clock, ran down and sank exhausted into his chair, Mrs. Horatio ventured the irrefutable observation that after all Horatio Junior was their only child, and Sylvia Hayden was a nice little thing. This drew fire.

Very deliberately then Mrs. Horatio murmured pleasantly that if she remembered rightly this had been the very objection Horatio Senior's father had made to their own marriage.

At this Horatio Senior flushed scarlet and said promptly that his marriage had been ideal; that his Jennie had been the one wife in the world for him; that time had proved it—even to his parents; that she was the only person on earth who really understood him.

After this nothing was simpler than to discuss just when Horatio Junior had better start East.

• • • • • • •

Had Sylvia dreamed when she licked the envelope's flap with her small red tongue and smoothed it down with her pretty white finger she was thus loosing Alton City's thunderbolts, she might, perhaps, have hesitated to send the letter she had penned and perhaps would not have started off so jauntily late that afternoon to post it.

Toward six o'clock she telephoned she was at the Doanes and Henry and his mother—the little old lady she had met on the train the day she arrived—wanted her to stay to supper. He would bring her home early in the evening. There would be a moon—Marcia need not worry.

Marcia had not thought of worrying until that minute, but now, in spite of knowing Sylvia was safe and in good hands she began, paradoxically enough, to worry madly. Timidly as a girl she summoned Stanley Heath to the small, round table.

"Sylvia isn't coming," she explained, all blushes. "She telephoned she was going to stay over in town."

They seated themselves.

It was the first time they had ever been alone at a meal.

"My, but you are a marvelous cook," Heath remarked, during the progress of the meal.

"Oh, not really. You're hungry—that's all. Things taste good when you are."

"It isn't that. Everything you put your hand to is well done. You're a marvelous person, Marcia."

"You are talking foolishness."

"Every man talks foolishness once in his life, I suppose. Perhaps I am talking it tonight because our time together is so short. I am leaving here tomorrow morning."

"Stanley!"

Across the table he caught her hand.

"I am well now and have no further excuse for imposing on your hospitality. I have accepted every manner of kindness from you—"

"Don't call it that," she interrupted.

"What else can I call it? I was a stranger and you took me in. It was sweet of you—especially when you knew nothing about me. Now the time has come for me to go. Tomorrow morning I am giving myself up to the Wilton sheriff."

"Oh, no—no!"

"It is the only square thing to do, isn't it?"

He rose and came to her side, slipping an arm about her.

"Marcia. Dearest! I am doing what you wish, am I not? You wanted me to go through with it."

She covered her face and he felt a shudder pass over her.

"Yes. But that was then," she whispered.

At the words, he drew her to her feet and into his arms.

"Marcia, beloved! I love you—love you with all my heart—my soul—all that is in me. You know it—know that every moment we have been together has been heaven. Tell me you love me, dear—for you do love me. Don't deny it—not tonight—our last night together. Say that you love me."

"You—know," she faltered, her arms creeping about his neck.

He kissed her then—her hair, her eyes, her neck, her lips—long, burning kisses that left her quivering beneath the rush of them.

Their passion brought her to her self and she drew away.

"What is it, dear?" he asked.

"We can't. We must not. Something stands between us—we have no right. Forgive me."

"But my dear—"

"We have no right," she repeated. "We must not love."

"But we do, sweetheart," was his triumphant cry. "We do!"

"We must forget."

"Can you forget?" he reproached.

"I—I—can try."

"Ah, your tongue is too honest, Marcia. You cannot forget. Neither can I. Our pledge is given. We belong to one another. I shall not surrender what is mine—never."

"You—Know," She Faltered, Her Arms Creeping About His Neck.

"Tomorrow—"

"Let us not talk of tomorrow."

"We must. We shall be parted then."

"Only for a little while. I shall come back to you. Our love will hold. Absence, distance, nothing can part us—not really. Tell me you love me so I may leave knowing the truth from your own sweet lips."

"I love you, Stanley—God help me!"

"Ah, now I can go! It will not be for long."

"It must be for ever, dear heart. You must not come back. Tonight must be—the end."

"You mean you cannot face tomorrow—the disgrace—"

"I mean tonight must be the end," she reiterated.

Through narrowed lids, he looked at her, scanning her averted face.

Then she heard him laugh bitterly, discordantly.

"I have, apparently, expected too much of you. I might have known it would be so. All women are alike. They desert a man when he needs them most. The prospect of sharing my shame is more than you can bear." Again he laughed. "Well, tonight shall be the end—tonight—now. Don't think I blame you. It is not your fault. I merely rated you too high, Marcia. The mistake was mine—not yours."

He left her then.

Stunned by the torrent of his reproach, she stood motionless, watching while, without a backward glance, he passed into the hall and up the stairs.

Even after he was out of sight, she remained immovable, her frightened eyes riveted on the doorway through which he had disappeared.

Ask About 2c Electricity

Our electric system must be designed to carry the maximum annual load which occurs during the winter months. This load drops off sharply in the spring due to changing seasons with the result that we have considerable excess capacity in plants and lines in the period from March to June. Therefore, during these four months we propose to pass on to our customers the use of this excess capacity, by selling all electricity over and above last year's bill, plus 5%, at 2c per K. W. H. Each month's bill in 1936 will be compared with the corresponding month in 1935 to determine the amount to be billed at 2c.

EXAMPLE:

If your April 1935 bill was $3.00, then all electricity used over and above $3.15 ($3.00 plus 5%) during March 1936, will be billed at 2c per K.W.H.

This new low rate shall apply to residence and commercial lighting, residence and commercial optional customers and rural customers on bills designated April, May, June and July.

Hiram Wins the New Car Argument

Mirandy's got a hunch that we should git us a new car by gee, she says the bus that we have got is most worn out, it ain't so hot no more, it ain't streamlined a bit, I guess that she's ashamed of it. It leaks at ev'ry gasket and acts like the gears was full of sand; two cylinders don't fire no more, I step the throttle to the floor and yet can hardly climb a hill. I swore I'd keep that car until my bank account was nice and fat, yet it don't look so good at that, and runs still worse, Mirandy said some day I'll find the motor dead, and then we'll have to walk, by gum, or else just sit around and hum.

A feller ought to have some pride when he goes out to take a ride, so if Mirandy Jane and me came out in a new car, by gee, the neighbors all would think, I guess at farmin' we are some success. They make them cars so pretty now, I'll have to rustle up somehow enough to git one, it will pay. Instead of takin' most a day to git to town, my errands done I'll git back home before the sun is very high, in time to do my work before the day is through. Oh, shucks, why argue when I know before the week is out I'll go and trade in this old boat of mine for one a million times as fine? We ain't so old, in things like these my wife and I have young ideas!

HONEST MAN TO PAY AN OLD DEBT

Gaylord—Eight years ago a farmer visited the office of the county treasurer of Sibley county. He wanted a license for his car, but didn't have the money. He said he would pay for it as soon as his cows freshened in the spring. The kindly treasurer issued the license. Hard luck and later the depression made it impossible for him to pay the license fee except in part. The other day he appeared at the treasurer's office and paid the balance of the eight year old obligation.

NEW SERIAL YARN BY CHANNING POLLOCK

"Synthetic Gentleman" Reveals Author's Deep Insight.

Channing Pollock has written such dramatic masterpieces as "The Fool," "The Enemy" and "The House Beautiful." He wrote the lyric for "My Man," immortalized by Fanny Brice. But—

"My only real talent," he has declared, "is for friendship. I know more bishops and burglars, chorus girls and capitalists, bootblacks and barons, than any other one man in the universe."

And right there you have the explanation of the remarkable insight into

both the upper and lower crusts of life that makes his new adventure novel, "Synthetic Gentleman," some of the grandest reading of this or any other year. It is the story of a second-story worker who broke into another man's house, stepped into another man's shoes (while his own were drying by the fireplace) and found that in order to keep the girl he loved he had to go right on wearing the disguise of a gentleman.

Playwright, novelist, short story writer, essayist, poet, lecturer and lyricist of distinction, Channing Pollock, born in 1880 in Washington, D. C., has become one of the outstanding literary figures of the present day. It is with pride that this newspaper announces that his "Synthetic Gentleman" will appear in these columns in serial form. This bright, exciting story is guaranteed to keep anyone who begins it hanging on breathlessly to the very last chapter.

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN
© The Safety Man

The organization of school boy patrols around the American Public Schools has been a highlight in recent public safety activities.

School boy patrols organized and conducted in keeping with standards set by the National Safety Council were found high in the favor of cities covered in a recent survey.

Dangerous street intersections have been guarded during the time of the day when children are going to and from school. Traffic regulation helped to make these corners and intersections safe.

The educating value of a good school patrol is a big feature in accident prevention work. Children, themselves, take an active interest and as a result teach their parents proper observance of the rules and signals.

I firmly feel that school boy patrols under the proper supervision and with the right regulation are a very stimulating means for the prevention of accidents around our public schools.

On Finding God

(From Kagawa's Meditations)

God dwells among the lowliest of men. He sits on the dust-heap among the prison convicts. With the juvenile delinquents He stands at the door, begging bread He throngs with the beggars at the place of alms. He is among the sick. He stands in line with the unemployed in front of the free employment bureaus.

Therefore, let him who would meet God visit the prison cell before going to the temple. Before he goes to church let him visit the hospital. Before he reads the Bible let him help the beggar standing at his door.

If he visits the prison after going to the temple, does he not by so much delay his meeting with God? If he goes first to the church and then to the hospital, does he not by so much postpone beholding God? If he fails to help the beggar at his door and indulges himself in Bible-reading, there is a danger lest God, who lives among the mean, will go elsewhere. In truth he who forgets the unemployed forgets God.

Washington Digest

National Topics Interpreted
by William Bruckart

National Press Building — Washington, D. C.

Washington. — President Roosevelt has very neatly called the bluff of his critics that he is wasting billions from the treasury and doing nothing to replace it. With much less ballyhoo than ordinarily precedes the presentation of tax legislation to congress, the President sent a message to the Capitol calling for new tax levies approximating a billion dollars in yield and in so doing dropped into the laps of the house and senate critics one of the hottest potatoes they have ever been called upon to handle. If one were to characterize the play in the language of baseball, since spring is here, I believe one could say that congress either must play ball or let the runners score.

Hot Potato for Congress

It was the greatest tax bill ever submitted in peace time. Whether the proposals the President has made are economically sound or whether the levies he thinks advisable will do the job he expects of them, of course, remains to be seen. But the fact cannot be dodged that Mr. Roosevelt has figuratively settled down around the ears of those who have constantly challenged the waste inherent in his vast reform and recovery program with a straight-from-the-shoulder demand upon congress that it vote new taxes.

It is a most interesting situation, politically. In nearly a score of years of Washington reportorial experience, I cannot recall having seen so much squirming and wriggling as well as fretting and mumbling among representatives and senators. It is only natural that they do not wish to go into a campaign for re-election when there is the certainty that here, there and everywhere they will be confronted with heckling as to their vote for new taxes—assuming they will vote terrifically heavy levies as the President has suggested, and as present indications seem to assure. They have no heart for a tax increase at this time. But, to repeat, they are faced with a situation in which they must either vote for new and heavier taxes or else they will be forced to swallow many long winded speeches in condemnation of the President's course.

* * *

Force Hands of Opponents

Whatever the merits of the Roosevelt proposals may be, there is no course open for his opponents except to support him in the general move to pay as you go. Unless they support these new tax levies, all of the howling and the shouting and tumult about a reduction in the treasury deficit becomes just so much belly-wash.

Opponents may differ with the President as to the details of his tax plan but the situation he has created for them compels that they stand with him. To do otherwise would be not only inconsistent but rather dumb.

Frank Kent, the able news commentator, summarized one phase of this situation the other day by saying: "It makes no difference that the situation which compels the imposition of new and heavy taxes is largely Mr. Roosevelt's fault. And it makes no difference that the move is forced by the exigencies of his campaign for re-election and is designed to spike the most damaging charge against him—that he has piled the debt mountain high and by terrific expenditures menaced the national solvency. All that and more may be perfectly true; but for the Republicans and his non-political critics, who have been assailing Mr. Roosevelt for months because of his failure to balance the budget to either obstruct or hold back now that the President urges congress to provide by taxation the money to pay for the vast gifts it has voted would be beyond the limit in political insincerity and hypocrisy."

In other words, there nearly is no alternative for opponents of the President's policies. They must show their sincerity by going through with him in the laying of new taxes. I do not mean by that statement that it is necessary for them to accept without argument the exact levies which he has proposed. If they were not in accord with the taxes he proposes, they would not be serving their constituencies unless they so stated, but if they object to the levies he has offered, let them bring forward substitute proposals that will produce a revenue yield in a like amount. They cannot afford to criticize and then refuse to offer constructive propositions in turn.

* * *

Blames High Court

On the other hand, it seems to be the consensus among Washington observers that Mr. Roosevelt ought not to be allowed to get away with one declaration which he made in submitting his tax proposals to congress. He said that the necessity for these new taxes arose from the Supreme court decision invalidating the processing taxes upon which the Agricultural Adjustment administration and its subsidies to agriculture was predicated. Of course, that may be true at the moment, but, as one frequently hears pointed out in Washington conversation, the President used the bounties to farmers and the AAA itself as one of his keystone policies. The fact that it was unconstitutional surely cannot be said to be the fault of the Supreme court and yet that was the implication in the President's message.

Likewise, the President hinted that a part of the taxes was due to congressional action in passing the bonus, which he vetoed and congress made operative over that veto. Again, I hear it questioned that congress is actually to blame. It is being said with great frequency that had Mr. Roosevelt made the fight against payment of the bonus this year that he did a year ago, it is almost inconcievable that congress would have passed it over his veto.

It is being said in this connection that if Mr. Roosevelt really had desired to kill the cash payment of the bonus, his stalwart leaders in the house and senate could hardly have afforded to refuse his request to vote against it. Instead of that situation, the record shows that such recognized spokesmen as Senator Robinson of Arkansas, the Democratic leader in the senate, Senator Harrison of Mississippi, Senator Byrnes of South Carolina and Senator Radcliffe of Maryland, a personal friend, all voted to pass the bonus over the President's veto. I may not be thoroughly acquainted with the maneuvers of politicians but I cannot believe these men would have turned their backs on the President in the bonus fight unless they entertained a feeling that he did not seriously object.

* * *

Taxpayers the Goat

So it simmers down that the men who a year ago and two years ago voted the President almost limitless power and limitless funds to deal with an emergency are now compelled, if they intend ever to be statesmen, to stick by, vote the taxes and take it on the chin if that is to be the reaction from the voters. After all, it is merely the taxpayers who are the goats and as usual the taxpayers have not a great voice in their own defense. As to the President's tax proposals themselves, congress is asked to levy an unprecedented type of tax on undistributed corporation profits. New processing taxes to replace those outlawed by the Supreme court, being designed to be constitutional, are proposed and a tax which the President described as a "windfall" tax to recover a considerable part of the old processing taxes returned to taxpayers was suggested. He asked also that levies be laid on dividends which are now exempt from normal tax on individual incomes.

The "windfall" tax is designed to offset the action of the Supreme court which ordered the return of the processing taxes as having been illegally collected. In other words, the administration is attempting to get by one method what the Supreme court said it could not get in the manner it employed.

The tax on undistributed profits of corporations is the center of all kinds of controversy already. Opponents of this levy maintain that if the government forces corporations to pay taxes on reserve funds they have laid aside for the proverbial rainy day, such as we have experienced for the last six years, none of them can stand the gaff of another depression. Mr. Roosevelt contended that his tax proposal in this direction, which would take away approximately one-third of such reserves, was designed only to prevent the piling up of cash by corporations instead of distribution of those funds to stockholders.

There will be much hauling and filling, many charges and countercharges, much maneuvering and manipulation as congress mulls over the new tax bill. It will pass some kind of new taxes and citizens will begin early next year to take out of their pockets money to pay off the deficits of the reform and recovery program.

* * *

Star Route Mail Service

Some 75 years ago, the government organized mail service to inland points without railroad facilities, calling this new service the Star route. This service has been continuously in operation in scores of communities and it is continuing to operate exactly on the same basis as it did three-quarters of a century ago. So, this is a plea in behalf of those who carry the mail on the Star routes and for better service for Star route patrons.

There is a bill in congress now which proposes to provide better service for those carriers and for patrons of those routes. When one recalls that the boasted phrase of the Post Office department—"the mails must go through"—had its origin with the Star route carriers, it seems that the time is long since gone by to consider justice for these faithful servants. It seems, further, that if there are real "forgotten men" in this country, they truly are the carriers on the Star routes and the patrons of those routes. Even in the face of all of the hullabaloo that Senator Black, Alabama Democrat, is making about lobbying, those who desire to see justice done for the Star route service, those who believe that the entire postal service should be considered, and not just a part of it, should do their utmost to have congress act on this legislation.

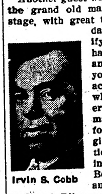
what Irvin S. Cobb thinks about:

Corned Beef and Plagiarism

HOLLYWOOD, CALIF.—The luncheon of our Writers' Club, Inc., (Red Inc.) is a weekly function, with corned beef and cabbage and plagiarism charges. This week we had with us the leading fiction writer of the Pacific slope—Mr. Daingerfield, the local weather forecaster.

Another guest was William A. Brady, the grand old man of the American stage, with great tales of the ancient days, when, to qualify as a trouper, one had to be a pedestrian. Before they asked you whether you could act, they found out what kind of a walker you were. But how many of those sure-footed California beginners counted cross-ties as they trudged into enduring fame? Belasco and Tom Wise and Frank Bacon and Holbrook Blinn and Dave Warfield and many another.



Irvin S. Cobb

We also welcomed some new members. We're very exclusive. There are groups here that'll take in people who even failed to make the Book of the Month club. But to join up with us, you must have written something significant—insurance or promissory notes or booster slogans. We're angling now for a distinguished new figure in the field of literature. He does sky-writing, by the way.

New Deal's 3rd Birthday.

THIS being the third anniversary of the New Deal, I was just thinking that, whether or not it lived through the early part of next November, its folks could never reproach themselves that they'd failed to give their darling babykins the best nursing money could buy. Just then who should rush in but Michael Strogoff, the courier of the czar, shouting that the U. S. marines had just landed with a contradiction of the terrifically exciting announcement made only yesterday by the same fellow who took the message to Garcia that time—?

Hold on, I'm getting all twistified. What I'm trying to say is that one day the word for a palpatating planet was that Douglas Fairbanks, Sr., was positively going to marry Lady Ashley, whereas but 24 hours before, he positively was not going to marry Lady Ashley. Then finally he did it.

Main Street Ambition

ONE hears San Francisco would lure more inhabitants in an effort to overtake Los Angeles. But why?

And why do Americans get drunk on population statistics? It's their headiest tipple. Every time Uncle Sam looses his census figures, some towns go into mourning because they haven't grown any faster and other towns have public dancing in the streets because a swarm of new people have moved in to make traffic congested and living inconvenient and pleasant neighborhoods crowded.

Offhand, I think of but one city whose ruling citizens mainly are content with things as they are—the lovely and fascinating city of Charleston. Elsewhere we appear to share with the red ants the mad passion to take on addition red ants until the anthill overflows and all the old resident ants are lost in the shuffle.

* * *

Feminine Bank Rolls

WHY can't people mind their own business? A merchandising expert, who probably was just sitting around the house during the cold spell with nothing to do except feed the stove, made an exhaustive inquiry to find out what American women carry in their handbags. He now reports that, in addition to gobs of other things including lipstick, cigarettes, hairpins and recipes, the average woman's pocketbook contains $6.74 in cash.

It was perhaps all right for the gentleman to satisfy his morbid curiosity. Where he erred was in making his discovery public. Just consider how busy the boys in congress will be, thinking up new taxes, when they hear about that much money still being in circulation.

* * *

Politicians Making Claims

IN CONGRESS these mad March days are being much used for plain and fancy claiming.

The Republicans claim the Democratic party is to blame for the recent bad times and deserves no credit for the better times now prevalent, the Republican theory being that the good fairies must have brought 'em.

The Democrats claim that such bad times as we've had since they moved in were really inherited from the final stretch of the previous administration, which, as they seem to recall, was one of the best times for bad times anybody ever saw.

If there are any little odds and ends of unclassified times floating around, both parties are willing for Senator La Follette to claim them for his very own.

Danger at Table Mountain

Table mountain, near Cape Town, in Africa, is sometimes suddenly enveloped by a famous cloud phenomenon called the Tablecloth, very dangerous to climbers.

Hello, Everybody!

"Death Rides the Waves"

By FLOYD GIBBONS
Famous Headline Hunter.

DID you ever notice, boys and girls, that in all the stories you read about shipwrecks and storms at sea you never seem to hear anything about the fellows who get the worst of it? I mean the boys down below decks in the engine room.

Harry Helgesen of Brooklyn, N. Y., tells us about what the "black gang" is up against in a storm at sea. He ought to know, too. Harry is a licensed marine engineer in steam and Diesel.

Harry's big thrill came when he was assistant engineer on the auxiliary steam yacht Ulvira on a hard luck cruise in the Atlantic. The cruise started from Brooklyn for southern waters on February 8, 1934, but they never got very far south. The bad luck started the very first day, Harry says, when the ship grounded on Roamer's shoals in the channel. The crew of amateur and professional sailors finally got her afloat again and the ship came back to port and went into drydock for inspection. The hull was found O. K. but they had lost a couple of days.

When the Sea Kicks Up There Really Is a Mess.

The next start was made in a snow flurry and everything went fine until they got to the open sea. Once there the sails were run up and the engines cut off. Down in the engine room the "black gang" was getting things ship-shape. Now when an auxiliary yacht is under sail things are generally easy for the boys under decks, but just as they were about to bank the fires, Harry says, the chief mate came down and said they were in for "a bit of a blow."

And a "bit of a blow" was putting it mildly. Wham! a storm from the north slapped the Ulvira with a broadside that nearly turned her over. In a second all was busy as a beehive in the engine room. "Full steam ahead" came the order from the bridge, and Harry and his gang went into action.

Death Signs on the Ulvira's Cruise.

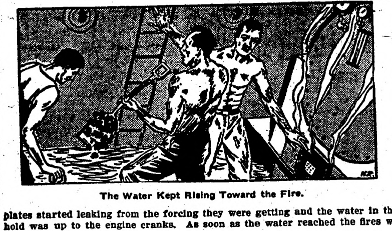
Harry ran up on deck to get the smoke stack hoisted. The stack had been let down when the sails were run up and they needed more draft. On deck all was confusion. A boom had snapped under the strain of the gale and the sail and boom were hanging over the side and into the water like a sea anchor. And that wasn't all.

Hubert Kuechenmeister, a young Northwestern university student and amateur sailor, had been swept overboard. The huge waves breaking over the rail made rescue impossible. Death had signed on the cruise of the Ulvira!

Harry got his stack up and hurried down the ladder to his station. What he had seen on deck wasn't very encouraging, but his job was below decks, and he went to it. Those engines had to get going or the boat and all on it would be lost.

The engine room by now was a mess. The boat was pitching heavily, Harry says, and the huge seas shipped at each pitch started coming down through the bunker plates, hatches and deck houses and filling the bilges with water.

"We started the pumps," Harry writes, "but the ashes stirred up by the water kept clogging the strainers and the water kept rising. The engines were going full blast but we didn't know how long that would keep up. The boiler plates started leaking from the forcing they were getting and the water in the hold was up to the engine cranks. As soon as the water reached the fires we were through."



The Water Kept Rising Toward the Fire.

And the water kept rising. It was swishing across the floor like it does in a ship's pool on a rough day. Anything that floated became a menace as it sailed back and forth at breakneck speed with the action of the ship. In all this dirty water full of ashes and debris, Harry and a fireman spent an hour "diving." Diving in an engine room means going under the water to free the strainer from the debris drawn in by the suction of the pumps.

How Would You Like to Dive Into Slimy Water?

Just imagine diving in that slimy water wondering if you are going to be swept up against the boilers and scalded to death!

Up on deck another fight was going on against the elements as the ship reeled under the shock of the gigantic waves, but our story is below decks and below decks we stay.

The four men in the black gang fought the advancing water for 24 long hours without relief. Once the captain came down and asked if they wanted more men, but the chief engineer knew that a greenhorn would only be in the way and asked for a bottle of rum instead.

The rum came down and Harry says it saved the lives of everybody on that ship. The rum gave the exhausted men new life and for the next two hours they worked like madmen. The high point of the water was only eight inches from the boilers. Another inch and it would be the boats, and the boats could never live in a sea like that.

But that extra inch never came. Instead, the four men watching the water in the ash pits suddenly let up a weak cheer. The water had stopped! The pumps were at last holding their own!

After Death's Vigil the Black Gang Got Hungry.

Well, sir, the gang realized then that they were hungry. Harry climbed perilously up the ladder to the deck to search for food. The galley was a watersoaked mixture of food-stuffs and kitchen utensils that slid back and forth across the floor with every movement of the ship. The ship's cook was gone seasick. And the galley fires were long since dead.

But that black gang had to eat so Harry fished up a side of bacon and finding some eggs unbroken in the ice box he managed to snare a frying pan and carried his prizes down the ladder again.

The U. S. Coast Guard to the Rescue!

Two men braced him then as he held the frying pan over a shovel full of live coals. Harry admits it was the best meal he ever tasted in his life. He admits, though, that he has had better service. They picked the food out of the pan with their hands and had coal dust for salt and pepper—but it tasted swell.

Then came the coast guard and towed the disabled yacht into Norfolk, Va., and the mid-winter, hard-luck cruise of the Ulvira was history.

Heads Toward Locomotive

Passengers lie with their heads toward the locomotive in berths on trains. This position was originated in the earlier days to eliminate drafts and soot, notes a writer in the Kansas City Star. Many persons complain of illness if lying with their feet toward the front of the train. When patients are placed in ambulances, however, the head is toward the rear of the vehicle, which is said to be more restful.

Copenhagen, the City of Spires

There are so many spires and towers in Copenhagen, Denmark, that the capital of the Danes has been called the "City of Spires." The tallest spire surmounts the city hall. The Erloserkvike is also famous for this feature, which has a curious spiral design. Then there is the notable Round tower, originally intended as an observatory, which is ascended by a very wide spiral road, up which a horse and carriage can be easily driven.

Like the Schoolmarm, Wild Duck Appreciates Hospitality

Remember the country "schoolmarm"? Spending one week with one family and the next with another, she fared well on good food and comfortable sleeping quarters. "If wild ducks could have such hospitality for three years, their annual migrations would soon resemble those of 50 years ago," says Col. H. P. Sheldon of the United States bureau of biological survey. "Like the 'schoolmarm,' a wild duck appreciates good food and good resting places."

"The 'schoolmarm' wouldn't have lasted long on starvation rations and a plank bed. Our ducks won't last long either if the public continues to let itself be guided by the slogan, "Let's kill 'em while they're here."

Boat Sinks, So Indiana Town No Longer Is Port

An ancient wharf-boat, partly submerged in the Ohio river, is the last remaining vestige of what once was a thriving river traffic which prevailed here for more than a century, states a Madison (Ind.) correspondent in the Cleveland Plain Dealer. Recently the Madison wharf-boat sank when ice floes knifed through her hull and officials of the Greene line thereupon abandoned this city as a port of call between Cincinnati and Louisville. Declining river shipping and high wharf maintenance costs were given as the reason.

Many Madison merchants recall when this city had four wharfs. In those days the town had a large pork industry, a starch works, furniture, cotton and woolen factories, as well as big trade in tobacco, wheat and other farm products. There were several competing steamboat lines making regular calls at Madison daily. Fifty years ago Madison also had the only railway connection with Indianapolis between Cincinnati and Louisville. Now all is different. This is still a river town, nestling between the hills and the stream, but hard-surfaced roads, bridges and trucks have eliminated the port of Madison. A few packets still ply the river, but none stops here.

France Forming Solid Front Against Germany in New Crisis—Paraguay Made Totalitarian State—Chester Davis Is Sent to Europe.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

SIXTY thousand German troops in the Rhineland that was supposed to be demilitarized. Practically the entire French army in and behind the vast system of fortifications along France's eastern frontier. The French government, backed by the other signers of the violated Locarno treaty and by the little entente, Poland and Russia, demanded that Germany withdraw her troops from the Rhineland or that sanctions, economic and possibly military, be imposed by the League of Nations. Great Britain trying hard to keep the peace, reproving Germany, supporting the French demands in great measure, but urging that Hitler's proposal of new non-aggression pacts be given consideration. Reichsfuehrer Hitler reviewing his forces in the reoccupied territory and receiving the loud plaudits of the inhabitants for restoring their military sovereignty.

M. Flandin

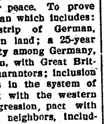
That in a nutshell was the perilous situation in Europe as the representatives of the Locarno nations and the council of the league assembled in London to consider what to do next. Foreign Minister Pierre-Etienne Flandin of France was there with the full support of Premier Sarraut for his demands that immediate action be taken to bring Hitler to time. He was represented as "almost convinced" that a "preventive war" now would be preferable to "carnage two years hence," and in Paris it was disclosed that France counted on having at her disposal, from her own forces and those of Russia, Poland and the little entente, a potential army of about 40,000,000 men. It was said 8,000,000 could be mobilized in 48 hours and 31,000,000 were trained reserves; and that 8,000 airplanes and a million tons of warships were ready.

The Franco-Russian treaty came up in the French senate and was ratified by a huge majority. It is this pact that Hitler gave as his excuse for remilitarizing the Rhineland, asserting that it was a violation of the Locarno treaty, being aimed at Germany. It is the final link in the "iron ring" around the reich which France has been forging.

At first the British government's response to France's demands for full support against Germany was ambiguous and not satisfactory to Sarraut and Flandin. After conferences with Prime Minister Baldwin and other ministers, Capt. Anthony Eden, the young foreign secretary, appeared before the house of commons and declared any attack on France or Belgium in violation of the Locarno pact would compel Britain to go to their assistance. He added, however, that there was no reason to suppose "the present German action implies a threat of hostilities." Then he indicated Britain was willing to consider Hitler's proposals for new peace covenants.

The British statesmen seemed so calm in the crisis that there was reason to believe they knew in advance what Hitler intended to do. When Flandin and the other Locarno signatory representatives arrived in London, the attitude of the British cabinet changed and grew decidedly stiffer.

HITLER was not represented at either the Locarno conference or the session of the league council in London. He himself, having precipitated the crisis, made his triumphal appearance in the Rhineland and then awaited events. His dramatic and sudden denunciation of the Locarno treaty was accomplished in a speech before the reichstag and in formal announcements to the ambassadors in Berlin of the nations concerned. He asserted that the troops he sent into the Rhineland comprised a "symbolic" army only, and that the reich, while ready to defend itself, was wholly desirous of peace. To prove this he offered a plan which includes: A demilitarized strip of German, French and Belgian land; a 25-year non-aggression treaty among Germany, France and Belgium, with Great Britain and Italy as guarantors; inclusion of the Netherlands in the system of pacts; an air pact with the western powers; a non-aggression pact with Germany's eastern neighbors, including Lithuania; and return of Germany to the League of Nations after her equality is established and her sovereignty restored.



Adolf Hitler

France's reply to this was that, having just violated one treaty, Hitler could not be trusted to observe another; and anyway, France would not even listen to the reichsfuehrer's new proposals until he had withdrawn his troops from the Rhineland. The French army was moved toward the frontier and the "Maginot line" of fortifications and underground passages was fully manned. This system of defenses has been criticized because it requires so many troops that the army is rendered virtually stationary—what has been called in Paris "the concrete army." Remaining forces would be insufficient for offensive movement. But this fault might be disregarded if France gets the expected millions of soldiers from her allies.

CHIEF JUSTICE ALFRED A. WHEAT of the District of Columbia Supreme court checked the telegram-seizing activities of the Black senate committee on lobbying. He granted the Chicago law firm of Silas H. Strawn an injunction restraining the Western Union Telegraph company from giving the committee copies of the firm's telegrams.

The judge said the subpoena served on the telegraph company by the committee, calling for copies of telegrams "goes way beyond" the committee's powers.

Next day William Randolph Hearst, newspaper publisher, began a fight in court to keep an original confidential telegram out of the hands of the Black committee; and the American Newspaper Publishers' association denounced the reported seizure of that telegram, which was to one of Mr. Hearst's editors. The association advised any other editor, should he learn of similar action, to consult counsel and "take vigorous steps to protect his constitutional rights."

COL. RAFAEL FRANCO, who became provisional president of Paraguay after the recent revolution there, has set up a totalitarian government modeled after German Nazism and Italian Fascism. He issued a decree which declared the state and the "liberating revolution" of February 17 as indivisible and banned for one year political, labor, or other unions which "do not emanate explicitly from the state."

Rafael Franco

Paraguay, the government asserted, will be purged of "endemic, demagogic, industrial, and sectarian evils." The official statement places in the "liberating army" the principal source of authority.

The aims of the new government, the decree said, will be the construction of a new, strong Paraguay and constitutional reorganization for a future republic.

CHESTER C. DAVIS, head of the invalidated AAA, is not going to administer the soil conservation program devised as a substitute. President Roosevelt announced that Mr. Davis would leave soon on a trip to Europe to make a special study for the government of economic conditions bearing on the agricultural plans for this country. Critics of the administration immediately assumed that Mr. Davis and Secretary of Agriculture Wallace had disagreed and that the former was being gently edged out of the picture. This Mr. Wallace warmly denied, asserting there had been no friction and that he had deep affection for Mr. Davis and the sincerest respect for his ability and integrity.

In announcing the assignment, Mr. Roosevelt said: "In requesting him to make this study for our government, Secretary Wallace and I have had in mind the distinguished service Mr. Davis has given American agriculture, especially during the last two and one-half years. As administrator he has been directing governmental efforts which, to a considerable degree, were made necessary by changes in the European outlets for American farm products.

"Information to be gathered by him at close hand as to the precise nature and extent of these economic changes abroad is expected to assist greatly in developing American farm programs."

GREAT BRITAIN is interested and pleased to learn that King Edward VIII may abandon his state of bachelorhood and take unto himself a wife. This was revealed when the king authorized these lines in the message submitting the civil list to the house of commons: "His majesty desires that the contingency of his marriage should be taken into account so that, in that event, there should be a provision for her majesty."

EARL BEATTY, commander of the British war fleet in 1916-18 and afterward first lord of the admiralty, died in London after a long illness at the age of sixty-five. Rising from a sick-bed to attend the funeral of Earl Jellicoe last November, he predicted that he would soon follow his colleague. Lord Beatty had a meteoric career as a naval commander and displayed his ability in the battles of Heligoland Bight and Dogger Bank, and especially in the battle of Jutland where he commanded the first battle cruiser squadron. His wife, who died in 1932, was Ethel Field, daughter of the Chicago merchant prince, Marshall Field.

POWERS of the federal trade commission to investigate unfair trade practices will be greatly broadened by the Wheeler bill approved by the senate interstate commerce committee. It is vigorously opposed by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, the National Association of Manufacturers and the American Newspaper Publishers' association. The measure would:

Make "deceptive acts and practices in commerce" unlawful in addition to "unfair methods of competition" specified in existing law.

Expressly give the commission authority to proceed "upon its own initiative," as well as that of the President, or either house of congress as now provided.

Include persons and partnerships as well as corporations within the scope of the commission's authority to investigate business practices and conditions in interstate and foreign commerce.

Redefine "documentary evidence" to include "books of account, financial and corporate records," and make such records subject to commission subpoena.

COMMUNISTS and radicals who appeared as representatives of the Workers' Alliance of America went before WPA Administrator Harry Hopkins and made a series of demands that were all coldly turned down by that gentleman. These included the dismissal of Victor F. Ridder, New York WPA director; no cut in the 3,500,000 persons on works relief, and full union pay and union hours for persons on relief and pay for sick leave. They also demanded that all employed, whether or not on relief rolls, be given WPA work.

IN RECENT financing operations the government sold $1,355,643,550 in bonds and notes, according to Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau. The offerings, largest since the Victory bond issue of 1919, were heavily oversubscribed by banks. This borrowing brings the public debt up to the record figure of $31,413,000,000. The treasury's cash balance is increased to $2,675,000,000.

The funds will finance New Deal spending in the near future, partially defray bonus costs and retire $450,000,000 worth of treasury bills falling due March 16.

PLANS to furnish TVA power to the city of Knoxville, Tenn., under a project to be financed with PWA funds were blocked by a temporary restraining order issued by the District of Columbia Supreme court.

The order was granted on the petition of the Tennessee Public Service company which contended its $4,000,000 investment in Knoxville would be rendered practically worthless, if the government brought cheaper power into the city.

Also in the District Supreme court, 66 producers of soft coal attacked the Guffey coal control act as unconstitutional in its entirety on the ground that it invades the rights of the states and deprives producers of their property without due process of law.

KOKI HIROTA, former foreign minister, formed a new ministry for Japan and submitted the names to the emperor. He, besides being premier, takes the foreign minister's portfolio. Lieut. Gen. Count Juichi Tarauchi is put in as minister of war and Admiral Osami Nagano as minister of navy. Military leaders insisted that Hirota "show a proper recognition of the gravity of the times and the necessity for renovation of Japanese foreign policy," and to this demand he yielded somewhat.

Koki Hirota

Hirota issued a statement saying that "the present empire situation requires independent and positive readjustment of our foreign relations in order to liquidate this emergency."

Hachiro Arita, new Japanese ambassador to China, told the press in Shanghai that "it is fundamental that China recognizes Manchukuo and that the other North China questions should be settled on the spot."

"There has been no change in Japanese policy in China as a result of the recent Tokyo incident," he declared. "Japan will carry out the three principles of Koki Hirota, former Japanese foreign minister, requiring that China eliminate anti-Japanism, co-operate economically with Japan and Manchukuo and co-operate in the elimination of communism within China and along the borders."

LIEUT. ROBERT K. GIOVANNOLI of Lexington, Ky., hero of the spectacular bombing plane crash during army tests at Dayton, Ohio, last October, was killed in a crackup of his army plane at Logan field, Baltimore. Giovannoli's single seated pursuit plane lost its right wing coming out of a glide and hurtled down in a crazy spin from an altitude of less than 500 feet. It rolled over after hitting the landing field and was demolished.

JAMES J. FARLEY, chairman of the Democratic national committee, let it be known that the party chieftains would make no effort to keep Al Smith out of the national convention in Philadelphia if he is elected a delegate and presents proper credentials. And once he is seated, there will be no attempt to keep him from speaking his mind. Administration leaders, it was represented, believe Mr. Roosevelt will dominate the convention so completely that no attack by Smith or anyone else on the New Deal can have any considerable effect.

MINNESOTA NEWS

Winona—Flood waters made highway travel hazardous in widely separted sections of the northwest.

Farmington—H. G. McHugh of Farmington was elected president of the Minnesota Retail Meat Dealer's association at the organization's convention at St. Paul.

Robbinsdale—Excavation for a new $300,000 high school is under way in Robbinsdale, less than two miles from where an $800,000 senior high school is planned for north Minneapolis.

St. Paul—A $300,000,000 building program, including at least 5,000 homes will be carried out in Minnesota in 1936 in the opinion of officials at the Minnesota Association of Architects.

Minneapolis—A driving, wet snow whipped across the state and threatened to paralyze traffic. Trains, buses and planes ran behind schedule and in some case service was cancelled as visibility became too poor for safety.

Marshall—For the fourth successive year, Lake Marshall township in Lyon county has no tax levy. The township first reduced its levy to zero in 1931. In 1932 it voted $1,500 and since has handled its funds so that no levy was necessary.

St. Paul—Pointing out that relief problems are likely to be with us always, L. P. Zimmerman, state relief administrator, recommended creation of a new state board of public welfare within the next 10 years to handle all state relief activities.

Janesville—A new all-time score in the Land O' Lakes Creamery operators efficiency contest was announced when awards were made at the organization's annual meeting in Minneapolis. A score of 99.32 was made by Fred H. Ulman, operator of the Janesville Creamery association.

Deerfield—Removal of approximately 300 deer from Itasca State Park will be necessary this spring to save the herd of 2,500 from starvation, state conservation department officials announced. Thirty-one deer have been transferred to the Paul Bunyan state forest and the Deerfield and Bemidji game refuges.

Clarissa—A Great Northern railway snowplow cleaned the tracks here recently and, in its zeal for cleaning, completely shaved off 68 planks of the platform of the depot. As the plow, hitched behind a freight engine, passed by the station, the wings of the plow fell to the ground and peeled off the planks for about 50 feet.

Hibbing—Traffic at Virginia, Hibbing and other iron range communities was near a standstill due to the recent snowstorm and suspension of school classes was ordered. Although all roads were blocked to motor travel, the Hibbing Daily Tribune managed to get its papers to subscribers by using horse drawn sleighs. The longest haul was eight miles to Chisholm.

St. Paul—J. R. Sweltzer, a member of the Minnesota legislature since 1921, filed recently for the office of lieutenant-governor of Minnesota. A graduate of Hamline university and a World War veteran, Sweltzer was chairman of the house appropriations committee during the 1935 session of the legislature and during the special session this past winter. He is a resident of St. Paul, engaged in the contracting business.

St. Paul—The Minnesota old age pension difficulty is squarely before the federal social security board, with word from Washington that chances are better than even the state law will be approved in spite of the limitation of $75,000 in state administrative expense. There is no need to fear it will be thrown out on the same grounds the Kansas law was rejected by the federal board, it was learned. In Kansas, administration was left to counties with requests to them that they agree to state supervision on a voluntary basis. This federal act requires a state agency such as the Minnesota law sets up.

Minneapolis—The sharp drop in food prices in January and early February, particularly on eggs, fats and oils, meats, cereals and bakery products, means a saving of a million dollars a day to American consumers. However, a month's supply of food for the average family, which cost $30.00 at average prices of 1933, cost $37.66 at February, 1936, prices, which were still 25% higher than in '33, according to a two-year family buying power study just issued by Northwestern National Life Insurance Company of Minneapolis. Living costs increased much faster than income in 1934, the analysis shows; in 1935, however average income gained on living costs, a trend which is continuing so far in 1936, the figures indicate.

Minneapolis—Some 800 people, gathered in the Flame room, Hotel Radisson, to pay tribute to Bernie Bierman on his forty-second birthday, heard Major John L. Griffith make a stirring defense of college football. Hailing Bierman as a great coach, a great sportsman and a man among men, the commissioner of athletics for the Western conference dwelt at length on the need for the competitive spirit fostered by athletics, especially football, in American life.

Uncle Sam Fast Becoming the Greatest Tree Planter

Tree planting in this country is looking up, according to the United States forest service. In 1935 the forest service's own planting on national forest lands was very close to a quarter million acres, more than that planted by all agencies—federal, state, and private—in 1934 when the total was 206,333 acres. Many of the other agencies planted substantially greater acreages in 1935 than the year before.

Uncle Sam, although relatively new at it, is becoming the world's leading tree planter. Up to last year his grand total of plantings by all agencies amounted to only 2,394,397 acres, equal to about half the area of Massachusetts. This year's plantings in the national forests alone will increase the total by more than 10 per cent. There are more than 162,000,000 acres in our national forests alone, and the estimated total forest acreage in this country is over 500,000,000 acres.

CONCENTRATED SUN RAYS MELT STEEL

4,000 Degrees of Heat Produced by Invention.

Los Angeles, Calif.—H. E. McCoy, bald Los Angeles inventor, gingerly held a steel plate in front of a beam of his "concentrated sunlight" and chuckled as the ray promptly melted a hole through the plate, the molten metal dripping down like melted butter.

He waved triumphantly at a huge revolving battery of 60 mirrors which was focusing the bright California noonday sun into a beam some 4,000 degrees Fahrenheit in temperature.

"We'll run all our factories with 'sun power' through outfits like this some day," he declared. "Give me the capital to build one eight times as big as this one, and I'll make the sun generate enough electricity to light a city of 80,000 population."

Uses Three Panels.

McCoy's invention consists of three panels, each holding 20 curved slabs of silvered window glass. They tip up or down and run on a circular track, following the sun's path from east to west. The sun's rays are kept aimed constantly on a fire-brick over 15 feet away.

All the sunlight striking 60 square feet of mirror is concentrated on the small target, raising the temperature to approximately half the terrific heat of the surface of the sun itself.

McCoy says he has melted, among other metals, tungsten carbide, indicating the furnace develops well over 4,000 degrees Fahrenheit.

Confident of Adoption.

He is confident the apparatus will be adopted by industry to replace coal and oil for heating factory boilers. He says that for $25,000 he can build an ore-smelting plant equivalent to present-day smelters costing $100,000.

"It sounds fantastic," he said, "but I think the motorist of the future may drive up to a service station and, instead of buying gasoline, exchange the battery of his electric automobile for one that has just been charged by a solar furnace generating plant."

Undertakers are already consulting the inventor on the possibilities of using the device for cremation of bodies, their idea being that cremation by sunlight has a certain poetic appeal.

As a test, he placed a two-pound rabbit on the "hot spot." It vanished in smoke after two minutes under the concentrated sunbeam.

Intelligence Tests Fair Only After Some Practice

Ann Arbor.—Intelligence tests are fair in determining the comparative "I. Q.'s" of individuals only when those individuals have had equal amounts of practice in taking the tests, Dr. Edward B. Green, University of Michigan psychologist, has concluded, after repeating four times a series of 25 standard tests among 253 of his sophomore students.

In taking the tests over and over again the pupils showed improvement in performance which ranged from zero to 1,900 per cent, which led Doctor Greene to assert that the "prediction of success in vocational and educational activities would be greatly improved if individuals could be compared at known levels of efficiency. It is seldom useful to compare individuals when it is known that one of them has had considerably more practice than the other," he says. "Only those tests which show from none to 25 per cent improvement may be used as a comparison between individuals."

In easy comparisons, including the speed of easy reading and easy pencil mazes, and in hard comparisons, study of difficult cube designs, improvements ranging from 26 to 75 per cent were shown. In medium comparisons the improvement ranged up to 200 per cent and in solution of such puzzles as can be remembered the improvement was 800 per cent.

Co-Eds Firmer Than Men in Holding to Studies

Lewisburg, Pa.—Women are steadier than men, according to conclusions drawn by the "Bucknellian," student newspaper at the Bucknell university.

The paper conducted a survey of the number of students who changed courses after the opening of the term and found that 225 men switched classes, while only 120 coeds changed their programs. It was concluded that women in general may change their minds more frequently than men, but coeds exhibited more steady convictions.

Strange Whatisit of Sea Is Big Puzzle

Boston.—What is it that has a head like a serpent, a body like an eel and a tail like a rat? That was what marine biologists were trying to determine after the strange creature—12 inches long—had been picked up in a fishing net off Georges Bank, 200 miles east of Boston. Fish experts agreed it was not a baby sea serpent.

Lights of New York

by L. L. STEVENSON

Unsavory was the old city penitentiary now being demolished by WPA workers on Welfare island. Built almost a century ago, with cells only three feet wide and the only light that from a small hole in the door of each, through the years it gathered grime and germs. It held only petty offenders but the walls are of limestone four and five feet thick and the stone partitions between cells are two feet thick while the bars and grill works are set firmly. So the workmen are having a tough time in demolishing it. They are razing the south wing now. That south wing figured largely in the news several years ago. Prisoners with political connections ruled the penitentiary. Austin H. McCormack, appointed commissioner of corrections under the Fusion administration, staged a "raid" and the city thus "recaptured" its own prison. The south wing was the dwelling place of the prison aristocracy. The cells had silk curtains. There were pieces of fine furniture and curtained wardrobes contained outfits of evening clothes.

* * *

Black as is the old prison, its history is still blacker. Within its walls have been unspeakable cruelties and many crimes of violence. There have been rebellions in which blood was shed. How many lives were wrecked completely because of it is beyond computation. Hardened, professional criminals, caught in some minor offense, were sent there. So were desperate men to whom law or human life meant nothing. Drug addicts and degenerates formed part of the motley, ugly company of felons. With them were young boys convicted of their first offenses—and ripe for further instruction in crime. The prison became obsolete as a penal institution 30 years ago. Engineers condemned the interior as unfit for human beings 15 years ago.

* * *

The island on which the prison stands is in East river. The Indians called it Minnahonock, or Long Island. Capt. John Manning acquired it in 1664 and the name became Manning's island. His stepdaughter married William Blackwell and lived on the island and in time, it became Blackwell's island. The Blackwell mansion still stands, being used as quarters for doctors connected with the hospital on the island. When the city bought the island for $25,000 in 1828, one of the provisions was that the Blackwell mansion, built in 1709 or 1798—there is conflict as to the date—be allowed to stand. To take away some of the blackness of the prison on the island, the name was changed to Welfare in 1921.

* * *

Prisoners formerly confined in the Welfare island prison have been sent to the new penitentiary on Rikers island. Rikers island for years was a city dump. In fact, the island was practically built from city refuse. Occasionally, it catches fire and the smoke is no perfume. Also Rikers island is the home of the biggest rats known to mankind—rats that chase bull dogs into East river. But the new penitentiary is far superior to the old.

That recent survey which shows that the well-known "Boston accent" seems to be on the road to extinction brings to mind the fact that "Brooklynese" is heard less frequently in New York than it was when I first arrived. In those days it seemed as if most of New York believed that "world" was spelled "woild," and that "oil" was "erl." One night at graduation exercises of one of the uptown public schools, I heard a Supreme court justice say "foist" and a little later, he used the word "molder." That one of the members of that graduating class should remark to another, "Don't do that, Hoiby, you make me noivus," seemed perfectly proper after such an example. "Avenue" also had a peculiar pronunciation, which I can't reproduce and in many instances, "voice" was "verse." Christopher Morley's rhyme about "Anne stirred an erster stew" was an excellent example.

* * *

With the passing of the years, I thought my ear had become dulled to the idiom. But after consulting various sources, I have reached the conclusion that there is less "Brooklynese" than there was in those years past. It crops out occasionally even in the utterances of Alfred E. Smith, however. Then, at Christmas time, a young woman in a Forty-second street drug store, directed me to the "terlet goods counter." With many, "Pennsylvania" is still "Pennsylvanier" and "idea" is given a final "r." Oh, yes, the man in a change booth of the municipal subway Forty-second street station last night turned back a quarter on the ground that it was a "mutilated"—he made the first syllable rhyme with "but"—"kern." Brooklynese hasn't really passed but is passing.

Canada Boils Currency, Then Sells Pulp Paper

Ottawa, Ont.—The Canadian government now "boils" its old bank notes instead of burning them. Last year $50,000,000 in common bank notes were dumped into a huge vat and boiled to a pulp, which was sold to papermakers. Burning of old bills was abandoned as "wasteful" and because of the possibility of scraps of notes, partially burned, being carried through chimneys to the outdoors.

Land Problem Is Acute in 4 Areas

Resettlement Official Says Misery Will Increase.

Berkeley, Calif.—With virtually no good free land left in the United States for families to settle, the future of the country depends largely on the conservation and conversion to proper use of vast tracts that have been made useless by abuse in the past, believes L. C. Gray, assistant administrator of the resettlement administration.

"Less than a century ago," said Gray, "there were hundreds of thousands of acres of good land in the public domain available to citizens who wanted to stake out a homestead. Today not only is there scarcely an acre of such land but countless thousands of acres that once were profitable have been ruined unless they can be converted to other uses or restored to their original productiveness.

Gray cited four great districts in the United States where the misuse of land has not only made it unprofitable but in many cases has reduced the occupants to economic misery.

Poverty in great portions of the southern Appalachian mountains where living conditions are particularly severe, he said, is the direct result of an unscientific use of land.

Forests Rapidly Thinned.

Forests, which formerly provided the chief income, were cut off without any care for the future reproduction of trees.

The land as a rule is too steep for farming; cultivation only aggravates the problem by encouraging soil erosion, and with both the forests and top soil gone the standard of living of the inhabitants has decreased steadily.

The old forest region bordering the Great Lakes, which presents a similar problem; the western plains, where the destruction of forests has eliminated moisture and produced duststorms in recent years, and finally the old cotton belt of the South, he said, are instances of the misuse of soil that is now causing poverty for great portions of the people.

Problem Grows With Years.

The situation, he declared, is even graver for the future than it is for the present. With an inevitably increasing population the nation will require more land under cultivation in the future than now.

Whenever industrial depressions occur hundreds of thousands will go back to the land as they did during the present one.

With no virgin land left and with great sections of the country made profitless by misuse of the land in the past, the problem, he declared, can only be solved by a well-defined governmental policy of soil conversion and conservation.

Studies made by the resettlement administration, Gray believes, show that unless all people living off the soil can do so profitably a great burden of taxation is thrown on persons in other parts of the country.

Stomach "Dredge" Is New Surgical Device

Philadelphia.—Surgeons may go "fishing" in human stomachs through a new device perfected by Dr. Gabriel Tucker, professor of bronchoscopy of the University of Pennsylvania medical school.

So if you swallow your false teeth, an open safety pin or something equally dangerous, Doctor Tucker's new "tackle" is ready to be lowered into your stomach and start dredging operations.

Declared much simpler than equipment formerly used, the new invention contains a small pair of pliers at the end of the hollow rubber tube. Air is pumped in to inflate the organ and an x-ray device makes the area visible.

Click! Doctor Tucker's pliers grab the swallowed article and snake it out via the tube.

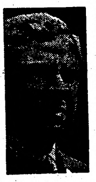
RUDYARD KIPLING

By

LEONARD A. BARRETT



In the poet's corner in Westminster abbey rest the ashes of a universally beloved poet, Rudyard Kipling. Even though we may delight to read the writings of certain authors, we do not always come to know them intimately through the literature they create. They impart their thought, but their own personalities still seem remote from us. Not so with Kipling. He himself was part and parcel of all he wrote. One learned to know the poet through his poetry, and for this gift of self-revelation as well as for the quality of his literature, Kipling will be remembered always throughout the English-speaking world.

His career was brilliant. We think of him primarily as a poet and rightly so, although his earlier work in a period through his forty-second year was in prose, mostly novels. Perhaps his first well-known book was "Plain Tales from the Hills," written when he was only twenty-two. Kipling wrote an average of one book a year from that time on until he was nearly thirty. At forty he published "Puck of Pook's Hill," his last work in prose. About this time the inspirational poetry of Tennyson had waned temporarily because of the infusion of a popularly distorted literature sponsored by Oscar Wilde who became the leader of the so-called esthetic movement in London. During this time, Kipling was engaged vigorously in writing poetry. When the opportune moment arrived, he gave to the English world his own soul in his newly created poetry. The impact was electric. It changed the current of English thought. Once more the highest and best in literature has been recaptured. In a very brief time Kipling was proclaimed universally a star of the first magnitude in literature.

Modestly he lived, and his last rites were in keeping with the spirit of his life. Much of his time was spent in the seclusion of his estate in Sussex. He declined many honors offered him by royalty, and, according to report, refused a proferred knighthood.

Perhaps his environment apart from the mad rush of life with its noise and crass materialism, contributed much to his genius. In the silence he found his own soul. In the silence the "mystery" spoke to him. Under the inspiration of that divine fire he gave to the world a poetry that will live forever.

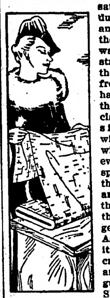
The rank of United States army clothier general was created during the Revolutionary war and was held for a time by James Wilkinson, later famous for complicity in the Aaron Burr conspiracy.

The Household

By Lydia Le Baron Walker

THE subject of textiles is of interest to every homemaker. It is she who buys the fabrics for linen closets, for furnishings, for frocks, and all the many articles made from textiles that are used by the household or in the home. Quality, styles, durability, innovations, new developments, etc., are all features with which she wants to be, and should be, acquainted.



In the early days of silk weaving the smoothness of the texture was not satisfactory largely due to the discrepancies in size of the strands of both warp and weft. The struggle to make these strands free from irregularities has been a long one, the filaments, especially from wild silk, refusing to wind and twist with absolute evenness during the spinning of the threads. Most of us are familiar with the irregularities of this sort found in genuine Shantungs. As a matter of fact it is these very discrepancies that are an aid in distinguishing oriental Shantungs from domestic makes—an important matter.

Methods in Variety.

Sizing, weighting and pressure processes have played their part in securing smooth surfaces in silks as well as the present ability to reduce irregularities in silk threads. With all these ways and means, and manifold methods, and processes, of providing smoothness to silken surfaces, today there is a return to old-time effects.

Rough surfaced textiles are in the ascendency, and with this vogue comes the reproduction of unevenness in weaving strands. These are imitated in tussards, pongees, and those silks in which purity of silk threads without smoothing and other finishing processes are most desirable. This return to wild silk weave effects and the accenting of what once were blemishes, and now are modish touches, is another evidence of the cycle of styles.

Non-Crush Treatment.

One of the latest movements in the making of materials has to do with processes that eliminate creases. Non-crushable fabrics range from linens to velvets. In these specific articles mentioned the non-crush feature is especially welcome. Linens ordinarily crease and muss very easily and require frequent pressing to keep them looking fresh and pleasing. Linen sheets and pillow cases, table linens and frocks, have the disadvantage of losing their crisp quality quickly just because of their mussing so readily. Frequent ironing is necessary. So it is a fine movement in manufacturing methods that relieves this work, and gets such admirable results.

Velvets are more difficult to restore when they get creases and marks of folds, etc. They have to be steamed either by hanging up in a room with a steamy atmosphere, or in a sheltered spot out of doors when it is foggy or misty. Or small places can be deftly restored by holding the material taut over a bowl of boiling hot water. If very badly creased by pressure or spot marked, they require to go to a cleaners to be restored. So non-crush velvet is a most welcome addition to modern textiles.

Upholstery Fabrics.

Upholstery fabrics that do not crush are a decided innovation and are sure to please homemakers. The non-crush velvets appear at a good time since velvets are among the luxurious upholstery and decorative materials at present. It may be that the fact that velvets can be had that are not crushable, has been one element in fostering their return to style. In the realm of clothes, now is the time to wear velvets, whether crushable or not, but the latter certainly have advantages.

Some mediums react better than others to the non-crush treatments, of course, but all up and down the line of kinds and qualities, the good work of preventing textiles from crushing and mussing easily is progressing.

"KINDNESS don't pay; I ought to know." Bitterness lurked in Miss Priscilla's usually placid tones. "I've been kind to folks all my life and where do I get it?" She paused to peer inquiringly over her glasses at Lila.

"In the neck?" suggested Lila, softly.

"That's it!" exclaimed Miss Priscilla with satisfaction. "In the neck. I couldn't think of the expression."

She took a turn or two with the tatting shuttle. "And HOW!" she added, with vicious emphasis.

Lila doubled up with delighted laughter. "You're coming on fine," she assured Miss Priscilla. "Best slang pupil I ever coached."

"I like slang," murmured Miss Priscilla, "it is so forceful and right to the point."

In the little pause that followed, the canary gave his opinion of life and sunshine in a thrilling crescendo.

Lila laid her hand on Miss Priscilla's knee. "Tell me one instance where kindness did not pay," she begged.

"One instance?" cried the lady of the tatting shuttle. "One? I could give you a dozen. There's the time I broke my heart over Mrs. Gordon and her cruel husband. I helped her to leave him and for months congratulated myself on having saved her life and reason. Then, one fine spring day, back she came, broke and repentant. Her fool husband forgave her, took her in, and . . . Oh, boy! do they hate yours truly!"

"What of it? Everybody else loves you," offered Lila.

Miss Priscilla gave her a stern glance and went on. "And Reta Henderson. They wouldn't let her marry young Anson Matthews. What did I do? I nominated and elected my fool self to the position of Cupid and smoother-out of the path of true love. I took Anson in to board for next to nothing and managed so that Reta could meet him at my house from time to time. They were married on her twenty-first birthday and my heart glowed with the consciousness of a glorious deed done." She snorted with contempt.

"I think it was a glorious deed," said Lila stoutly, "to unite two loving young hearts."

"O, yes, you would," sniffed Miss Priscilla. "Well, they married and had six young ones in eight years! They hate me worse than all the rest put together. Folks can solve their own problems and fix their own mistakes from now on for all of me. I'm through. I'm hard-boiled!" She glared at Lila.

"Oh, yeah?" answered Lila, unimpressed. "About as hard-boiled as a one-minute egg. But this is all in the past. You must have had something else happen to make you feel as you do today."

"You know the Simpsons," replied Miss Priscilla, tight-lipped, "all those young ones and him out of work most of the time? A few days ago I went over there and found Hazel, the seven-year-old, humped up near the fire, moaning enough to break your heart.

"'For pity's sake, what ails her?' I asked. Mrs. Simpson told me she had fallen and broken her wrist and her father had set it.

"'Set it,' I said, in surprise, 'has he studied surgery?'

"'No, he ain't,' snapped Mrs. Simpson tartly, 'but he's handy.'

"Well, I couldn't get my night's rest thinking of that poor little girl. Soon's I got my morning work done I hurried over to Simpson's.

"'You ought to have a doctor,' I told Mrs. Simpson.

"'No sech thing,' she whined at me, 'Pa's handy an' it costs a mint a money to hev a doctor.'

"Along about teatime I couldn't stand it any longer. I had talked over the phone with several neighbors and they had agreed with me that something ought to be done. So I called up the district nurse and the head of the Associated Charities. Both passed the buck to me. They thought something ought to be done but they didn't want to be the ones to do it. Then I called the doctor. After quite a while of conversation it was arranged. Yesterday Dr. Drummond and the district nurse came out to see Hazel."

During the pause that followed, Lila's eyes studied Miss Priscilla's face. "Why should that make you feel that kindness does not pay?" she asked Miss Priscilla gently. "I should say it paid richly in the knowledge that you had saved a child from being a cripple."

Miss Priscilla looked grimly over her glasses. Her hands fell idly in her lap. "Doctor Drummond found that the child's wrist was set perfectly," she said. "I'll be the laughing-stock of the neighborhood."

The clock ticked loudly in the silence. The canary stopped singing and preened his feathers. "Never mind," soothed Lila, "don't take it so to heart. If I ever need advice and consolation I know you'll give it."

"Not even to you," declared Miss Priscilla, her eyes flashing. "I love you, Lila, but I've learned my lesson. It's hands off from now on."

Lila looked up in alarm. This had cut deeper than she had thought. Maybe Miss Priscilla had really become hard-boiled. As she opened her mouth to protest, the telephone rang. Miss Priscilla hurried to pick up the receiver.

"Yes," she said. "Yes? You don't tell me! For pity's sake!"

She listened, intently. "Martha, that's terrible! Well, something's got to be done about it. Tell her I'll be right over . . . I've got a plan in my head . . . I'll fix it up!"

SYNOPSIS

The youthful and comely "Widder" Marcia Howe has as her guest her late husband's niece, Sylvia Hayden. A stranger, exhausted, finds his way to Marcia's home. He asks her to hide a package containing jewelry. She does so. Elisha Winslow, town sheriff, brings news of a jewel robbery nearby. The stranger gives his name as Stanley Heath. Sylvia discovers the jewels, and naturally believes Heath is a robber, but decides to say nothing. Marcia feels she has too deep an interest in her guest, but is powerless to overcome it. Heath wires "Mrs. S. C. Heath," New York, saying he is safe. He also orders a man named Currier to come at once. Sylvia, in her room, bedecks herself with the jewels. At Marcia's approach she hides them there. Heath asks Marcia to bring them to him. They are gone! Sylvia restores the jewels to their original hiding place. Elisha Winslow discovers them and has no doubt they are the stolen gems, and Heath is a thief. Leaving the jewels, he makes plans for arresting Heath. Currier arrives. Marcia overhears Heath describe how he acquired the gems, and is forced to believe him guilty of theft. Currier investigates the hiding place—and finds the gems! He returns to New York with them, but his references to "Mrs. Heath" have convinced Marcia her tender dream has been a foolish one. Elisha and [illegible] come to arrest Heath. The jewels, of course, are not to be found. To Sylvia Marcia admits she loves Heath and has faith in his innocence. She tells him she believes him innocent, but urges him, if he is guilty, to confess. He admits nothing, but compels her to confess she loves him, also telling her he is giving himself up to the sheriff. She insists this must be the end of their association, and he, thinking she will not face the "disgrace," reproaches and leaves her.

Then she swayed, caught at a chair and shrank into it, her body shaking and her breath coming in gasping, hysterical sobs.

The clock ticked on, the surf broke in muffled undertone, the light faded; the candles burned lower, flickered and overflowed the old pewter candle sticks; and still she sat there, her tearless, dilated eyes fixed straight before her.

Having no inkling of a change in the delightful relations that had for the past week prevailed in the Homestead, the atmosphere that greeted Sylvia when she came down the next morning was a shock.

Stanley Heath stood at the telephone talking to Elisha Winslow and on the porch outside were grouped his suitcase, overcoat and traveling rug. He was plainly ill at ease and had little except the most commonplace remarks to offer in way of conversation.

Marcia had not slept, as her pallor and the violet shadows beneath her eyes attested.

Although the girl did not understand, she sensed Marcia's need of her and rushed valiantly into the breach—filling every awkward pause with her customary sparkling chatter.

When at length the meal was cut short by the arrival of Elisha Winslow, all three of the group rose with unconcealed relief.

"Wal, Mr. Heath, I see you're expectin' me," grinned the sheriff, pointing toward the luggage beside the door.

"I am, Mr. Winslow."

"I've got my boat. Are you ready to come right along?"

"Quite ready."

Heath went to Sylvia and took her hand.

"Thank you very much," murmured he formally, "for all you've done for me. I appreciate it more than I can say. And you, too, Mrs. Howe."

"I wish you luck, Mr. Heath," called Sylvia.

"Thanks."

"And I, too," Marcia rejoined in a voice scarcely audible.

To this the man offered no reply.

They followed him to the door.

It was then that Marcia sprang forward and caught Elisha's arm.

"Where are you taking him, Elisha?" she demanded, a catch in her voice. "Remember, Mr. Heath has been ill. You must not risk his getting cold or suffering any discomfort."

"You need have no worries on that score, Marcia," replied the sheriff kindly, noticing the distress in her face. "I'll look out for him."

"Where is he going?"

"To my house for the present," Elisha answered. "I've a comfortable spare room an' I figger to put him in it 'til I've questioned him an' verified his story.

"Meantime, nobody in town will be the wiser. I ain't even tellin' May Ellen why Mr. Heath's at the house. If I choose to harbor comp'ny, that's my business. Not a soul 'cept Eleazer's in on this affair an' he's keepin' mum. When him an' me decide we've got the truth, we'll act—not before."

"That relieves my mind very much. Mr. Heath is—you see he—"

"He's a friend of yours—I ain't forgettin' that. I shall treat him 'cordin'ly, Marcia."

"Thank you, Elisha—thank you a hundred times."

There was nothing more to be said.

Heath bowed once again and the two men walked down to the float where they clambered with the luggage into Elisha's dory and put out into the channel.

Sylvia loitered to wave her hand and watch them row away, but Marcia, as if unable to bear the sight, waited for no further farewell.

But by noon she was, to outward appearances, entirely herself. She had not been able, to be sure, to banish her pallor or the traces of sleeplessness; but she had her emotions sufficiently under control to talk pleasantly, if not gaily.

That day and the next passed in much the same strained fashion.

It was not until the third morning that the barriers between the two collapsed.

Marcia had gone into the living room to write a letter. She sat down before the desk and started to take up her pen when Sylvia heard her utter a cry.

"What's the matter, dear?" called the girl, hurrying into the other room.

As Sylvia came nearer, Marcia bowed her head upon the desk and began to sob as if her heart would break.

"Oh, how could he!" moaned the woman. "How could he be so cruel!"

"What has happened, Marcia?"

"Stanley—he has left a check—money—thrown it in my face! And I did it so gladly—because I loved him. He knew that. Yet he could leave this—pay me—as if I were a common servant. I had rather he struck me—a hundred times rather."

The girl took the check.

It was filled out in Stanley Heath's clear, strong hand and was for the sum of a hundred dollars.

"How detestable of him!" she exclaimed. "Tell me, Marcia—what happened between you and Mr. Heath? You quarreled—of course I know that. But why—why? I have not wanted to ask, but now—"

"I'll tell you everything, Sylvia. I'd rather you knew. I thought at first I could keep it to myself, but I cannot. I need you to help me, dear."

Marcia unfolded the story of her blind faith in Stanley Heath; her love for him—a love she could neither resist nor control—a love she had known from the first to be hopeless. She confessed how she had struggled to conceal her feelings; how he himself had resisted a similar attraction in her; how at last he had discovered her secret and forced her to betray it.

"Of course I realized we could not go on," she explained bravely. "That we loved one another was calamity enough. All that remained was for him to go away and forget me—return to his wife, his home, and his former life. Soon, if he honestly tries, this infatuation will pass and everything will be as before. Men forget more easily than women. Absence, too, will help."

"And you, Marcia?"

"I cannot give up my love. It is all I have now. Oh, I do not mean to mourn over it, pity myself, make life unhappy. Instead, I shall be glad, thankful. You will see. This experience will make every day of living richer. You need have no fears for me, Sylvia. You warned me, you know," concluded she with a pathetic little smile.

"I was a brute! I ought to have shielded you more," the girl cried. "I could have, had I realized. Well, I can yet do something, thank heaven. Give me that check."

"What do you mean to do?"

"Return it, of course—return it before Stanley Heath leaves town. I'll take it over to Elisha Winslow's now, this minute."

"I wonder—yes, probably that will be best. You won't, I suppose, be allowed to see Stanley," speculated she timidly. "If you should—"

"Well?"

"Don't say anything harsh, Sylvia. Please do not blame him, or—"

"I'll wring his neck!" was the emphatic retort.

"Oh, please—please dear—for my sake! I can't let you go if you go in that spirit," pleaded Marcia in alarm.

"There, there—you need not worry for fear I shall maltreat your Romeo, richly as he deserves it," was the response. "I could kill him—but I won't—because of you. Nevertheless, I warn you that if I get the chance I shall tell him what I think of him. He is terribly to blame and ought to realize it. No married man has any business playing round with another woman."

"I am half afraid to let you go, Sylvia."

"You don't trust me? Don't you believe I love you?"

"I am afraid you love me too much, dear."

"I do love you, Marcia. I never dreamed I could care so intensely for anyone I have known for so short a time. What you did for my mother alone would make me love you. But aside from gratitude there are other reasons. I love you for your own splendid self, dear. Please do not fear to trust me. I promise you I will neither be unjust nor bitter."

"Take the check then and go. I wish I were to see him."

"Well, you're not! Let him do the explaining and apologizing. Let him grovel at your feet. That's what he ought to do!"

"You won't tell him that."

"I don't know what I shall tell him."

"Please Sylvia! You promised, remember."

"Don't fret. Some of the mad will be taken out of me before I see Mr. Heath. Kiss me and wish me luck, Marcia. You do believe I will try to be wise, don't you?"

"Yes, dear. Yes!"

"That's right. You really can trust me, you know. I'm not so bad as I sound."

Tucking the check into the wee pocket of her sweater, Sylvia caught up her pert beret and perched it upon her curls.

"So long!" she called, looking back over her shoulder as she opened the door. "So long, Marcia! I'll be back as soon as ever I can."

The haste with which she disappeared, suddenly precipitated her into the arms of a young man who stood upon the steps preparing to knock.

"Hortie Fuller," cried Sylvia breathlessly. "Hortie! Where on earth did you come from?"

Her arms closed about his neck and he had kissed her twice before she swiftly withdrew, rearranging her curls and saying coldly:

"I cannot imagine what brought you here, Horatio."

CHAPTER XI

"I can't imagine," repeated Sylvia, still very rosy and flustered, but with her most magnificent air, "what brought you to Wilton—I really cannot."

"Can't you?" grinned Horatio cheerfully.

"No, I cannot."

From his superior height of six-feet-two, he looked down at her meager five feet, amusement twinkling in his eyes.

Sylvia, however, was too intent on patting her curls into place to heed his glance.

"You wrote me to come, didn't you?" he presently inquired.

"I wrote you to come!"

"Well, at least you led me to suppose you'd like it if I were here," persisted Horatio. "Toward the bottom of page two you said: 'I am positively homesick'; and in the middle of the back of page three you wrote: 'It seems years since I've seen you.'"

"What if I did?" answered the girl with a disdainful shrug.

Nevertheless the dimples showed in her cheeks.

"And that isn't all," Horatio went on. "At the end of page five you wrote: 'Would that you were here'!"

Sylvia bit her lip.

"That was only a figure of speech—what is called poetic license."

"Then you didn't mean it when you said you wished I was here."

Horatio was obviously disappointed.

"Why, of course I am pleased to see you, Horatio. It is very nice of you to come to the Cape to meet my aunt and—"

"Darn your aunt!" he scowled. "I didn't come to see her. I am not interested in aunts."

"Take care! I happen to be very keen on this aunt of mine. If she didn't like you, you might get sent home. Don't be horrid, Hortie. I truly am glad you've come. You must make allowance for my being surprised. I haven't got over it yet. How in the world did you contrive to get away at this season? And what sort of a trip did you have?"

"Swell! I stopped overnight in New York at the Gardners. Mother wanted me to deliver a birthday cake to Estelle, who, you may remember, is the mater's god-daughter. She's a pippin, too. I hadn't seen her since she graduated from Vassar."

Sylvia listened.

She did not need to be told about the Gardners.

They had visited Horatio's family more than once and rumor had it the elders of both families would be delighted were the young people to make a match of it.

"I'm surprised you did not stay longer in New York," Sylvia observed, gazing reflectively at her white shoe.

"New York wasn't my objective. I came on business, you see. Dad gave me two months off so I could get married."

Sylvia jumped.

"I was not aware you were engaged," murmured she in a formal, far-away tone.

"I'm not," came frankly from Horatio Junior. "But I'm going to be. In fact I chance to have the ring with me this minute. Want to see it?"

"I always enjoy looking at jewels," was her cautious retort.

Horatio felt of his pockets.

"Where on earth did I put that thing?" he muttered. "Hope I haven't lost it. Oh, here it is."

He took out a tiny velvet case and sprang the catch.

"Oh, Hortie! Isn't it beautiful!" Sylvia cried. "It fairly takes away my breath."

"Try it on."

She shook her head.

"It wouldn't fit me. My hands are too small."

"It's a small ring. Here. Put it on," he urged, holding it toward her.

"Well, I suppose I might try it to please you. But I know it will be too large."

She slipped it on her finger.

"Why, it does fit. How odd!"

"Very odd indeed," he answered drily, as she reached her hand out into the sun and turned the diamonds so that they caught the light.

"Looks rather well on, doesn't it?" was his comment.

"It is a beautiful ring."

Horatio, standing behind her, twice extended his arms as if to gather her into them and twice withdrew them, deciding the action to be premature.

At length with a determined squaring of his shoulders, he locked his hands behind him and stood looking on while she continued to twist the ring this way and that.

"Well," yawned he after an interval, "I suppose I may as well put it back in the box."

Colorado's Story

Crude Forerunner of the Modern Ore Mill.

Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.—WNU Service.

THE story of Colorado's swift development in the short space of one lifetime is crammed with romance, tragedy, and high adventure, with strokes of good fortune and ill, as are few chapters in the national chronicle.

One day the region was raw, virtually untouched by civilization. The next, almost, men were starting to make a state out of thin mountain air and dusty sagebrush flats; were selling town lots at auction; issuing newspapers; building homes, churches, saloons, and theaters; organizing stagecoach companies; talking politics!

The stage probably had never been better set during American history than during 1859 for a rush to new lands. The country was in the middle of a great financial depression. Tens of thousands of others were barely making livings and were restless.

Then the news of gold discoveries in the Pikes Peak country sifted back East—not the true facts, but preposterously glowing accounts. Before the winter snows had melted, long lines of travelers were in motion, converging on the frontier towns nearest the Pikes Peak country—Leavenworth, Lawrence, Nebraska City.

What a mad scramble it became, that mass march to find the rainbow's end! Over the boundless prairie west of the settlements it spread, with scarcely a break from the Missouri to the Rockies Sturdy covered wagons, some with three yokes of oxen; light wagons drawn by horses and mules; horseback riders; men and women on foot trundling loaded pushcarts; other pedestrians with knapsacks; some reckless souls with nothing but the clothes they wore—all poured on toward the Promised Land. "Pikes Peak or Bust" was blazoned on many a wagon in the motley train. Some of these were to meet disappointment at the meager gold showings in river sands, and to return in a few months with only a sense of humor left, the old sign marked out and below a laconic new one: "Busted, by Gosh!"

Pikes Peak Diggings.

Before the discouraged return stampede to the East could run its course, there came news of really substantial gold discoveries in veins; then new hopes and a new and bigger gold rush. Where 10,000 had gone before, now probably 100,000 crossed the plains.

The Colorado mountains, it seemed, might be America's last frontier, and Americans turned toward them as children troop to a street parade. They overran the existing towns, built new ones, clambered into the mountains, staked claims or jumped them, dug, played riotously, fought, organized vigilante committees and courts, and began, ineptly at first, but determinedly, to iron the rough edges of the frontier into a civilized community.

So began the Pikes Peak Diggings, a group of communities that was to spread over a great area and to become 17 years later the Centennial state.

Mapwise, Colorado is something of an anomaly. Across it marches North America's mightiest mountain range and within it are concentrated Uncle Sam's greatest group of lofty peaks. Among these mountains rise some of the country's major rivers. Yet at no point does range or stream mark Colorado's boundaries. Its straight lines of meridians and parallels, hurdling all natural geographic features, actually bear a closer relationship to Greenwich, England, and the Equator than they do to the Rocky mountains or the Colorado river.

The eastern two-fifths of the state is a plains country, a continuation of the gently undulating and always rather dry prairies of western Kansas and Nebraska.

Approach from the west and you find that Utah carries over into the extreme western part of Colorado as Kansas and its neighbors do on the east. Dry plains alternate with tablelands, their rocky slopes clad with scraggy bushes.

It is in the middle panel of the state that you find the quintessence of Colorado—a land of foothills and sentinel peaks, tangled mountain ranges, and wide valleys.

Central Area of Colorado.

This great central area, where the earth has been thrust skyward, is the region of glittering gold to which Colorado owes its birth as a state. If you would plunge into this old Colorado of pioneer gold-mining days, drive west from Denver on paved roads, over the foothills, and up Clear creek for 25 miles. There, strung out in a canyon, you will find Idaho Springs, famous as "the town that is three miles long and three blocks wide."

Look up to sights that will become more and more familiar as you poke about the mountains: holes torn in the hillsides with steeply sloping dumps outside, as though huge animals had dug lairs, scratching the debris out behind them. A few are mere prospect holes, where some treasure-seeker guessed wrong. Others are portals of long tunnels. There are steep-roofed mills, some abandoned, some preserved for a better day.

But push deeper into the pioneer country. Turn up Virginia canyon and over a tremendous ridge to Central City and Black Hawk, the cradle of the Colorado mining industry. Here, at the "Gregory Diggings," the first gold was dug from veins, the first crude ore-crusher was evolved, the first steam quartz mill was erected. It was the miner's laboratory. Steam, fire, chemicals were tried in the battle to pry precious gold from worthless rock; and finally, in 1867, the first experimental smelter was set up.

Central City was a lusty town in those days, vying with Denver itself until well after Colorado became a state. At one time both United States senators and the state's single member of the house of representatives hailed from this little mountain town. It has never become a ghost town, like many of the early mining camps, but at times in recent years it has seemed to have at least one foot in the grave.

Gold has been a fetish in Colorado, as it has in all other parts of the world where it might be had for the digging; but it has played a mighty part in the state's life.

Gold Still the Magic Word.

Colorado has manifold interests and diverse activities now, but she hasn't deserted the old love. Talk for half an hour to any substantial Coloradan west of the one hundred and fifth meridian and inevitably the magic word "gold" will crop into the conversation. Through a new quest, a newly discovered vein, a new process, perhaps only a new personality whose genius for management is taking hold of a seemingly worthless property and making it pay, interest in gold is continually kept alive.

Panning from the gravels and sands of streams was the earliest method of gold recovery practiced in Colorado, as it has been in most of the world's gold fields. Then, in the mountains, prospectors found the weathered veins of ore from which the golden grains had been washed, and Colorado's second chapter in gold recovery started.

The third phase came when the hard, unweathered veins were followed into the rocky hearts of the mountains. It was then that Colorado gold mining ceased to be a one-man possibility. Much capital was required. Companies took hold; complicated treating plants were erected, and finally the era of smelters was ushered in.

Colorado has entered the fourth stage of gold mining now, and it is a typically modern American stage. Because of more efficient organization, better machinery, and more careful management, mining companies today are able to make money from ore so low in grade that a generation ago it was of no more value for mining than the top soil of an Iowa corn farm.

Visit one of these modern gold mines in the San Juan Mountain country and you will find it to be a self-contained little mining world, with its varied activities geared smoothly together, and with a steady outturn of product that reminds one of automobiles rolling from the assembly line of a Detroit factory.

Fine Motor Highways.

As you explore Colorado's mountain region, rich alike in gold and superb scenery, you find excellent motor roads penetrating the roughest terrain. The state's mountain highway system has opened up this region of tumbled peaks only in recent years. Twenty years ago the state's "summer land" consisted almost exclusively of the foothill country and the eastern slopes of the front range.

Now, with four excellent main highways crossing the Continental divide and with a network of minor roads and trails available, increasing numbers of the holiday crowds are pushing into the back country, where the fishing is better, where the highways are less crowded, and where, if one wishes to penetrate still farther, he can leave civilization itself behind and live for a time in an unspoiled wilderness.

Mountain highway building may appear simple enough to the vacationist, as he bowls along "in high" over loop after loop of gently rising road that lifts him eventually to a lofty ridge of the Rockies,

Simplicity and Honesty of Language Advocated by Dean

"In writing and speaking, be simple," says Dean Alford, "be unaffected, be honest in your speaking and writing. Never use a long word where a short one will do, you always lose by using a long one.

"You lose in clearness; you lose in honest expression of your meaning, and in the estimate of all people who are qualified to judge, you lose in reputation of ability. Elegance of language may not be in the power of all of us, but simplicity and straightforwardness are."

THE STORY OF FELIX

1—Felix was what is known as a tough nut.

2—In his school days the teachers even suspected he might be a mental delinquent.

3—He stood at the bottom of the class in all his studies.

4—The only thing he liked about school was the recess, during which he could get into a good fight.

5—He lacked anything approaching refinement, and thought delicacy was a place where they sold delicatessen goods.

6—He was a monotone and when the class sung the opening morning anthems his voice ruined everything and gave teacher the jitters.

7—He was the sort of boy who scribbled on fences with chalk.

8—He left school as soon as he could and went to work for a living.

9—They put him on a job that called for the intelligence of a seven-year-old child, and even at that he didn't seem to fill it.

10—He knew all the smoking-car stories and kept clippings from suppressed magazines.

11—He thought all art began and ended with the penny-in-the-slot peep shows.

12—He had a very low mind and people passed him up as hopeless.

13—It seemd impossible that he would ever get anywhere.

14—But he became a big figure in the show world and made a couple of fortunes.

15—He found he was equipped perfect mentally to write sketches for big Broadway revues. And some of the songs and lyrics.

HENRY

Who is this?

This is Henry.

Who is Henry?

Henry is a traveling salesman.

What is a traveling salesman?

A traveling salesman is a man who has been listening to people say "Nothing today" for the past three years.

Doesn't Henry get tired of hearing people say "Nothing today"?

Very, but he has become accustomed to it.

Is Henry downhearted.

No, Henry is not downhearted.

Why not?

Because being a traveling salesman and being downhearted don't go together. It is a profession for optimists only.

What is Henry doing now?

He is about to start out on another swing around the country in search of a customer.

Will Henry find a customer?

If there is a customer around anywhere Henry will find him, and just now Henry is very hopeful.

What makes Henry hopeful?

He knows from experience that no slump was ever permanent and that there comes a time when the stock gets so low that something has to be ordered to refill the shelves.

Has that time arrived?

Well, even if it hasn't, you won't find Henry discouraged. He will still be in there taking his cut at the ball and always trying.

THE STORY OF FRISBY

Frisby was well raised.

His parents were well to do and they gave him every comfort.

He was a pampered kid.

As an infant he had three styles of perambulators with a de luxe model for Sundays.

When he was a little boy he had a Shetland pony and was the envy of all the other little boys as he rode hither and thither and vice versa.

He also had two bicycles and was the first kid in the neighborhood to possess a motorcycle. He rode it to and from school.

When he was a little older his dad bought him an automobile and before he was sixteen years old he was pinched as a "scorcher."

He went everywhere in his red racing car. Even if he was only going a distance of two blocks he drove the distance.

He was raised to expect comfort and ease and to avoid exertion.

When he was eighteen he built himself an airplane and cut capers over the village.

There was only one method of travel with which Frisby was totally unfamiliar. That was pedestrianism.

Everybody predicted that he would some day figure in the headline, "Girdles Globe in Twenty-Four Hours."

Suddenly his folks lost their wealth and Frisby was thrown on his own resources.

It was a long time before he found a job, but he finally landed one. This was ten years ago and Frisby is still at it.

You'll never guess his job, so we'll have to tell you.

Frisby is a letter carrier.

MORAL—It is a bad idea not to learn to walk early in life.

PSALMS OF LIFE

Exercise

A lot of exercise is good
  For any girl or boy;
Long hikes along the open road
  Bring vigor, vim and joy.

A daily sprint stirs up the blood;
  A romp across the fields
Is something that pays dividends
  In all the health it yields.

A horseback ride is excellent—
  It tends to make one strong;
To gallop 'cross the countryside
  Is like a gypsy song.

A little swim each summer day
  (Say just a mile or two)
Will build your little body up
  And bring new pep to you.

A round of golf is very fine
  And maybe two or three,
While tennis is a type of sport
  That keeps the muscles free.

So be an outdoor boy or girl
  And with fine health abound;
You hike and swim and ride and jump—
  Not me! . . . I'll sit around.

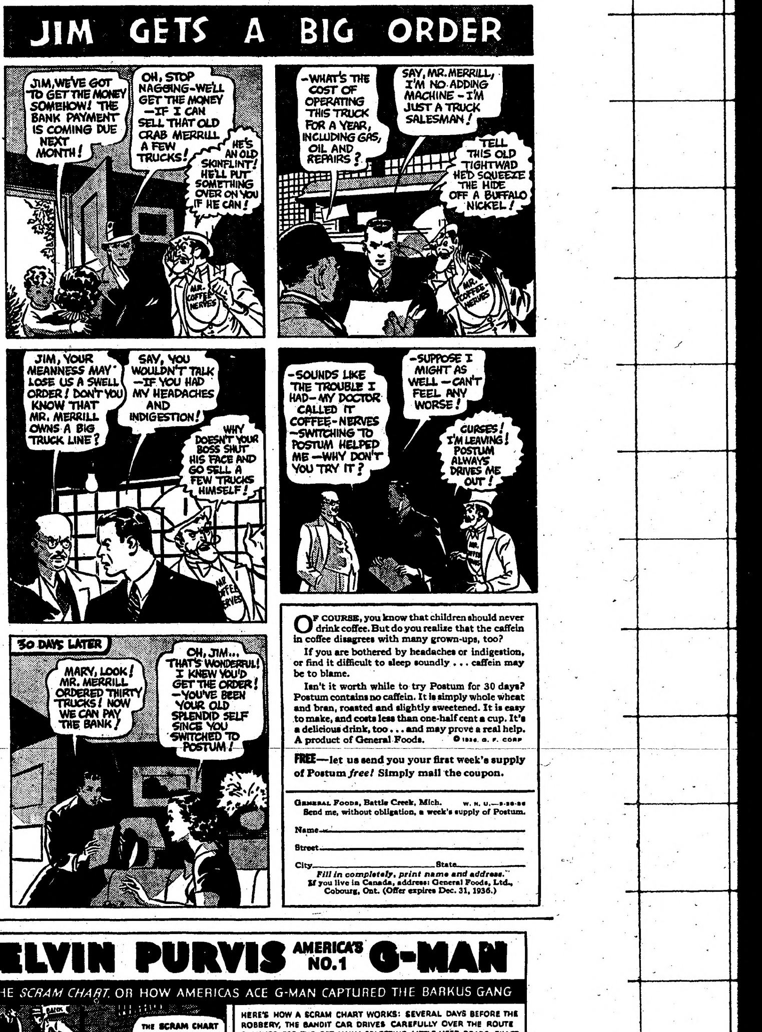
Clovelly's Beauty a Thing of Pride to Inhabitants

Clovelly is the old-established beauty queen of England, a beauty queen so proud of its appearance that its residents all do their family washing on one day, so that tourists will not be greeted by anything as prosaic as clothes lines of pajamas and stockings. When an old cottage there decays, H. V. Morton writes in "In Search of England," it rises again just as it was, looking at least five hundred years old.

PREJUDICE

No wise man can have a contempt for the prejudices of others; and he should even stand in a certain awe of his own, as if they were aged parents and monitors. They may in the end prove wiser than he.



JIM GETS A BIG ORDER
JIM, WE'VE GOT TO GET THE MONEY SOMEHOW! THE BANK PAYMENT IS COMING DUE NEXT MONTH!
OH, STOP NAGGING—WE'LL GET THE MONEY —IF I CAN SELL THAT OLD CRAB MERRILL A FEW TRUCKS!
HE'S AN OLD SKINFLINT! HE'LL PULL SOMETHING OVER ON YOU IF HE CAN!
MR. COFFEE NERVES
-WHAT'S THE COST OF OPERATING THIS TRUCK FOR A YEAR, INCLUDING GAS, OIL, AND REPAIRS?
SAY, MR. MERRILL, I'M NO ADDING MACHINE - I'M JUST A TRUCK SALESMAN!
TELL THIS OLD TIGHTWAD HE'D SQUEEZE THE HIDE OFF A BUFFALO NICKEL!
JIM, YOUR MEANNESS MAY LOSE US A SWELL ORDER! DON'T YOU KNOW THAT MR. MERRILL OWNS A BIG TRUCK LINE?
SAY, YOU WOULDN'T TALK —IF YOU HAD MY HEADACHES AND INDIGESTION!
WHY DOESN'T YOUR BOSS SHUT HIS FACE AND GO SELL A FEW TRUCKS HIMSELF!
-SOUNDS LIKE THE TROUBLE I HAD—MY DOCTOR CALLED IT COFFEE-NERVES —SWITCHING TO POSTUM HELPED ME—WHY DON'T YOU TRY IT?
-SUPPOSE I MIGHT AS WELL —CAN'T FEEL ANY WORSE!

MARY, LOOK! MR. MERRILL ORDERED THIRTY TRUCKS! NOW WE CAN PAY THE BANK!
OH, JIM... THAT'S WONDERFUL! I KNEW YOU'D GET THE ORDER! —YOU'VE BEEN YOUR OLD SPLENDID SELF SINCE YOU SWITCHED TO POSTUM!

OF COURSE, you know that children should never drink coffee. But do you realize that the caffein in coffee disagrees with many grown-ups, too?

If you are bothered by headaches or indigestion, or find it difficult to sleep soundly . . . caffein may be to blame.

Isn't it worth while to try Postum for 30 days? Postum contains no caffein. It is simply whole wheat and bran, roasted and slightly sweetened. It is easy to make, and costs less than one-half cent a cup. It's a delicious drink, too . . . and may prove a real help. A product of General Foods. © 1936 G. F. CORP.

The Inside Story of MELVIN PURVIS AMERICA'S NO.1 G-MAN
THE SCRAM CHART, OR HOW AMERICAS ACE G-MAN CAPTURED THE BARKUS GANG
WE DON'T KNOW WHICH WAY THEY WENT.
MR. PURVIS, DOES THIS MEAN ANYTHING? IT BLEW OUT THE WINDOW OF THAT GANG'S CAR AS IT SPED PAST MY GROCERY.
THE SCRAM CHART THEY WERE USING FOR A GETAWAY! YOU BET IT MEANS SOMETHING!
8/10.. RIGHT TURN
THE G-MEN SPEED AFTER THE BANDIT GANG!
MY HUNCH IS THAT WHEN THEY LOST THAT SCRAM CHART, THEY HAD TO CHANGE THEIR WHOLE PLAN OF GET-AWAY. I THINK THEY'LL KEEP ON THE MAIN HIGHWAY TO THE BORDER —AND I'M GOING TO HEAD THEM OFF! I KNOW A SHORT CUT TO THE CROSS ROAD... STEP ON IT AND WE'LL CATCH BARKUS YET!
AT THE CROSSROADS
THERE THEY GO! WE'RE TOO LATE TO STOP THEM!
TOO LATE, NOTHING! I'LL SHOOT OUT THEIR TIRES!
STICK 'EM UP, JOE BARKUS! WE'VE GOT YOU AND YOUR GANG DEAD TO RIGHTS THIS TIME!
IT'S MELVIN PURVIS!
YA CAN'T GET AWAY FROM THE G-MEN!

MELVIN PURVIS, formerly America's ace G-Man, who directed the capture of Dillinger, "Pretty Boy" Floyd, "Baby Face" Nelson, and many others. Mr. Purvis herein reveals the methods used in capturing criminals. Names have, of course, been changed. Today Melvin Purvis describes the capture of the "Barkus Gang"—which had just raided a bank in a small Illinois town. When the G-Men arrived there were no clues until . . .

HERE'S HOW A SCRAM CHART WORKS: SEVERAL DAYS BEFORE THE ROBBERY, THE BANDIT CAR DRIVES CAREFULLY OVER THE ROUTE PLANNED FOR THE GET-AWAY, SELECTING LITTLE-USED ROADS. EXACT MILEAGES ARE NOTED ON THE CHART. WHEN THE BANDIT CAR DRIVES UP TO THE BANK, THE MILEAGE GAUGE IS SET AT ZERO. WHEN THE CAR ROARS AWAY FROM THE SCENE OF THE ROBBERY, A BANDIT CALLS OFF THE MILEAGES AT WHICH TURNS ARE TO BE MADE..... "3/10THS OF A MILE, RIGHT TURN...2-1/2 MILES, LEFT TURN," ETC.

"POST TOASTIES are the finest breakfast treat ever!" says Melvin Purvis—"I eat 'em for breakfast every morning!" And when you taste those crisp, golden flakes, you'll agree with him!

For Post Toasties are made from the tender, sweet little hearts of the corn, where most of the flavor is. And each golden flake is toasted double crisp so it keeps its crunchy goodness longer in milk or cream.

Fire Marshal Aids Farm Protection

The State Fire Marshal's Department has been stressing the need of protecting Minnesota farms from fire. The Fire Marshal Department took this matter up and has been working on it for the last twelve months. In a Work's Project the department has been making a County Fire Map for every county in the state, which maps are to be deposited with the County Auditor. In addition the department has been working with a few villages and cities and the surrounding townships seeking to have the adjoining townships around a town, having an organized fire department, subscribe jointly to the purchase of a piece of farm equipment to be housed in the town or village having an organized fire department, and which piece of farm fire fighting equipment shall be used for fighting farm fires. This piece of equipment is called a "water wagon", and carries 300 gallons of water, a booster pump, booster lines, ladders and pump for drawing water from cisterns, wells, stock tanks ponds, etc. This "water wagon" is capable, from the supply carried from the engine house, of throwing a stream for fifteen minutes While this stream is being thrown a bucket brigade can keep filling this tank.

This type of equipment is newly designed for farm fighting purposes. Its cost, when spread over an area of five or six townships is approximately $5.00 or $6.00 per farm, and it has a life of twenty to twenty-five years.

Under the plan worked out by the Fire Marshal Department, the town or village which desires to work out this plan calls in representatives of the surrounding townships and a conference is had at which time the State Fire Marshal's office has its representatives present to outline the plan. The method of raising money is either by private subscription of each of the farmers benefited, or by assessment levied by the electors of the town meeting against the benefited properties under Mason's Minnesota Statutes of 1927, Section 1027, Sub-section 1-10.

"The State Fire Marshall Department made a survey of Minnesota fire equipment in connection with Works Project No. 702 and found that there was need of a rural fire fighting program based on the selection of key towns and villages to house modern equipment for fighting farm fires," said Dewey W. Johnson, Deputy Commissioner of Insurance and State Fire Marshal, in charge of the Fire Marshal Department. "It is apparent that with the growth and development of diversified farming in Minnesota that each year finds more of Minnesota's wealth placed in farm buildings and equipment, and, since a great portion of Minnesota's citizens live on the land, there is need for such a farm fire fighting program as this department is now advancing. We hope that when this program is carried out to its fullest extent that every town or village having fire equipment in Minnesota will have worked out a plan with its adjoining and neighboring townships so that a piece of farm fire fighting equipment will be housed and manned by the local village or city department subject to the fire calls of neighboring farmers. This plan is now being worked out in Milan, New Prague and Jordan, and was taken up at their annual meeting, and votes were taken authorizing the town boards to act jointly with the other townships and key city or village to acquire such equipment. This program carried out logically will cut the cost of insurance to the farmers through the Township Farm Mutuals, and will be of great aid to the Township Farm Mutuals in protecting the property from fire which they are now insuring."

In Memoriam

In memory of our dear husband and father, Louis Wegge who passed away one year ago, April 7, 1935.

Ti's hard to lay from out our sight
The form we loved so well
To know that with us on this earth
He never more shall dwell.
Could we but look beyond this vale
Where it is ever bright
Where our bright day to loved ones there
Would seem as darkest night.
Could we but see the joy beyond
With loved ones gone before
The smiles that always welcomed us
Beam from that other shore.
We will not wish him back again
To days of toil and pain
Back to the sad and lonely ones
Whose loss is but his gain.
The hands that toiled so patiently
In happy days of yore
The heart that loved so tenderly
Has only gone before.
In fancy now we hear him sing
The new songs of that land
In honor of his Lord and King
Amid that happy band.

Mrs. Louis Wegge and children.

Need Curb on Inquiries

Washington. — Overshadowing all else in the national capital at this writing is the controversy that is boiling and surging around the head of Alabama's Democratic Senator Black, who is the chairman of the senate's lobby investigating committee. As an offshoot of this controversy, the federal communications commission is in water much too hot for bathing and it begins to appear that when the steam blows off the communications commission is likely to be a thoroughly discredited federal agency because of the part it played in Senator Black's unprecedented seizure of private telegrams from the Western Union and Postal Telegraph companies.

Speaking generally, it has been seldom that a United States senator has ever attempted to assert the authority that Senator Black has used and it is equally unprecedented that a federal agency has gone to the extremes that characterized the action of the communications commission in connection with the seizure of the messages.

But some good may come from the police court prosecution tactics employed by Senator Black and some good may come from the accusations leveled at the communications commission because that body helped Senator Black carry out his plans.

The country-wide indignation that has arisen from Senator Black's usurpation of power has brought to the front a question that needs public attention and needs it badly.

I refer, in this connection, to the steadily expanding efforts of congressional investigators, especially senatorial investigators, to take over, as their own, powers that always have been regarded as reserved exclusively to the courts. The consensus among Washington observers certainly is that the legislative inquiries have developed to a point where the most humble requirements of justice have been and are being completely ignored. Whether they are so intended, these inquiries, and this includes investigations conducted by committees not only of congress but of state legislators and even city councils, are approaching the point where they are almost tyrannical.

It goes without saying, then, that the time has arrived for citizens to assert themselves. These inquiries will not proceed when the elected legislators, state or national, learn that the people do not approve of such high-handed tactics.

Black's Activities

In order to have an understanding of the latest of these escapades, it is necessary to review briefly what has happened in the case of the senate lobby investigating committee. Almost a year ago the committee sought the aid of the federal communications commission which had the color of authority in law for investigating the business of the telegraph companies. Senator Black issued a broad subpoena, directing the telegraph companies to make available any and all messages his committee desired. Communications commission agents then went into the telegraph company files, read everything they could find and made copies of all of the messages which those agents, under guidance of Black investigators, thought would be helpful to the Black committee in exposing operations of private individuals.

The purpose of this, as outlined by Senator Black, was to locate clues to the machinations of business interests who were seeking passage or defeat for legislation pending in congress. The Alabama senator wanted to "show up" lobbyists. He contended and has maintained consistently that "these malefactors of great wealth" could not accomplish any influence in congress unless it were done secretly and "in the dark."

In other words, Senator Black persuaded members of the communications commission to help him in his fishing expedition. He persuaded that organization that it should become a party to an unrecedented effort designed as a dragnet, a movement to smear anybody and everybody who had used telegraphic service.

The Black plan was carried out in secret. Senders and receivers of messages which those agents copied knew nothing about it. The operation was just as much "in the dark" as any of the lobbying about which Senator Black complained, even more so. It was only by accident that the facts became known but when they did become known, the lid was promptly blown off.

The end is not yet, nor is it even in sight. One federal judge has issued a restraining order against such tactics and a half dozen other applications for similar orders are pending. Undoubtedly, the questions, whatever the rulings may be, will find their way eventually to the Supreme court of the United States.

The senate itself is looking into the situation. It has, by resolution, asked the federal communications commission to make a report stating the facts and by what authority it acted.

So there is much hubbub about the whole thing and if one may judge from the line of conversation generally heard around Washington, Senator Black is on the hot spot, and the spot thus far has shown no indications of entering a cooling stage.

Charge Unfairness

Senate investigations long have been considered by many people as a modus operandi that creak with unfairness. Unbiased observers frequently have criticized them because of the methods employed. It seems absolutely necessary that the senate should have power to call witnesses, to ask legitimate and proper questions and to force answers. If it is going to enact legislation to correct evils, it must be equipped with such powers. But the point is that in seeking such information, the senate has consistently permitted its committees to act in a fashion that can be described by no other word than outrageous. I have watched them over a period of nearly twenty years and seldom, if ever, has there been an important investigation that did not degenerate sooner or later into a condition that savored of police court practices.

Respectable citizens have been subpoened, have gone before the committees willing to tell their complete story, anxious to co-operate and have found themselves treated as outlaws and criminals. This situation has become so prevalent in senate investigations that when any citizen is subpoened to appear before a senate investigation these days, his neighbors and friends begin to ask each other what crookedness is involved. In other words, the psychology of the senate investigation, as it has developed through the last fifteen or twenty years, has become one that reverses the constitutional right of an individual that he is innocent until he is proved guilty.

For several years, there has been a bill pending in congress designed to prevent, or at least reduce, lynchings. The theory back of it is that many times innocent persons have been lynched and that every one has a right to a trial by jury in a properly constituted court. Over across the Atlantic ocean, dictators have operated and have employed the "blood purge," the summary death sentence or the execution without granting the accused the right of defense. Undoubtedly some persons guilty of murder or rape have been lynched; undoubtedly the "blood purge" by the Nazi rulers destroyed some bad characters and undoubtedly the summary executions by the Soviet or the Fascists of Italy have provided death for individuals who were festering sores to humanity, but there can be no doubt that in the case or the lynchings or in the case of the "blood purge" or the summary executions, many innocent persons have had their lives snuffed out.

So it is with senate investigations. Undoubtedly they have uncovered some dirty crooked dealings. Undoubtedly they have brought to public attention activities and conditions that ought to have been exposed. Yet, the fact remains that nearly all of our people are decent people, law abiding and self-respecting. And when senate investigations go beyond proper limits they approach, if they do not wholly become, tyranny.

• • •

Not Wholly to Blame

In defense of Senator Black's action in the lobby investigation, I think it can fairly be said that he is not wholly to blame if he has gone further than any other in the program of inquiry and prosecution upon which he has launched. Little by little, bit by bit, the senate has arrogated to itself authority hitherto not used by it. Little by little, it has encroached upon what many believe to be the jurisdiction of the courts and in a like manner it has taken unto itself powers hitherto supposed to have been exclusively reserved to the executive department of government.

It would seem, then, that if other senate committees had established the precedent, Senator Black could properly use the same methods. The trouble in his case is that he did not stop at limits previously set, discreditable as those limits were, but went beyond them.

To repeat, there is every indication that some good will come out of this circumstance. Important men and brilliant lawyers and great organizations like the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, the National Association of Manufacturers and the American Liberty league have taken note of the steadily expanding power claimed by the senate. This means that the questions involved will get into the courts. It is to be hoped that they will be presented to the courts in such a manner that the questions may be finally and lastingly answered, that the powers of the legislators may be delimited and that a definite expression may come from the judiciary that will determine whether members of the house and the senate can serve at once as legislators, judges and prosecutors.

The county chapter sent $100 to the regional Red Cross office at St. Louis, and received acknowledgement that it was the first received there.

St. Paul—Minnesota this year probably will have fewer grasshoppers and less damage to crops by the insects than in any recent year, according to present indications. Arthur G. Ruggles, entomologist of the Minnesota college of agriculture, explained that the extreme cold of January and February did not affect the grasshoppers much, if any, but that the heavy rains last June killed millions of them.

St. Paul—If present administration economy plans go through, approximately 17 Minnesota CCC camps will be cut off and with them about 3,549 men. The move to economize on the civilian conservation corps aims to lop off about a fourth of existing camps. None of the boys will be fired from CCC rolls, Washington officials assured, but when they drop out, they will not be replaced. Certain camps will then be closed and the boys remaining in them will be transferred to others.

St. Paul—More than 1,500 WPA projects are under way in Minnesota, of an authorized total of 2,027 involving $22,166,536 of federal funds. Public buildings totaling 278 are down for assorted improvements to cost $2,820,495. Of these, 121 are educational buildings. Three housing projects were slated for $16,765 worth of work. A total of 223 parks and playgrounds are receiving WPA labor estimated to cost $4,773,234. Thirty-six flood control and other conservation projects are listed for an expenditure totaling $805,130. Water supply and sewer systems on which the WPA is at work numbered 174. The total cost is estimated at $1,481,783.

Ortonville—Sweeping toward the Arctic circle with guttural cries, thousands of blue geese flashed a migratory spectacle across western Minnesota. The flocks, known as "blue wavies," arrived at Big Stone lake according to their regular annual schedule on time. In the flying clouds of blue were dottings of white, the snow-geese consort of the wavies on the trail-blazing trek northward. Following the flight of cold-defying Canadian geese in early March the first blue wavies splashed into the lake with first certain signs of spring.

Armies Like Stuffed Effigy of a Prehistoric Monster

The armies of 1914 had more than two months of grace before they lapsed into the stagnation of trench warfare. Nowadays the proportion of machine guns and other automatic firearms has increased enormously.

It is thus a safe deduction and prediction that the armies of today would sink into trenches within a week—if they ever got to grips—for there is more than a possibility that these infantry bodies would be dispersed by air attack or hamstrung by the bombing of their transport while they were still groping forward.

The more one reflects upon the present type of armies, which is still the prewar type, with a few additions, the more do they appear like the stuffed museum effigy of some prehistoric monster—harmless if horrifying.—B. H. Liddell Hart in Current History.

After First Look, Dumb-bell Longed to Look for Life

It is true that once in a while, at a dinner, for instance, a woman is put next to a man who stolidly stares at his plate and answers "yes" or "no" to everything she says, writes Emily Post in the New York Herald Tribune.

I remember one occasion when a certain very attractive young woman struggled throughout the soup course and the fish course and halfway through the meat course without getting so much as a glance in her direction. Finally she said firmly:

"Will you please turn your head and look at me?"

He turned a face that was quite blank unless slightly raised eyebrows meant a glimmer of inquiry.

"I want to be sure you know," said she, "that I've tried my best to talk to you, and now I'm going to try no more."

Whereupon she turned to the man on the other side.

The end of this incident sounds like fiction, but I vouch for its truth. She is now the wife of the first man.

—15—

"Don't you think it would be wiser if I took care of it for you, Hortie?" suggested she demurely. "You are dreadfully careless. Only a moment ago you had no idea where the ring was. If it is on my finger you'll know exactly."

"Bully idea! So I shall! Now tell me where you're off to. You were in a frightful hurry when you burst through that door."

"So I was," agreed Sylvia. "And here I am loitering and almost forgetting my errand. Come! We must hurry. I've got to go to town. Want to row me over?"

"You bet your life! Show me the boat."

Leading the way to the yellow dory, she took her place opposite him and he pushed off.

As they sat facing one another, her eyes roamed over his brown suit; his matching tie, handkerchief and socks; his immaculate linen; his general air of careful grooming, and she could not but admit he wore his clothes well. He was not a small town product.

Three years in an eastern preparatory school, followed by four years of college life had knocked all that might have been provincial out of Horatio Junior.

Nevertheless these reflections, interesting though they were, proved nothing about his knowledge of the water.

Then she suddenly became aware that the boat was being guided by a master hand.

"Why, Hortie Fuller, I had no idea you could row like this!" exclaimed she with admiration.

Horatio deigned no response.

"Wherever did you learn to pull such an oar?"

"Varsity Crew."

"Of course. I had forgotten," she apologized, her eyes following as with each splendid stroke the craft shot forward.

Although the oarsman ignored her approbation he was not unmindful of it.

"Where do we land?" he asked.

"Anywhere."

He bent forward and with one final magnificent sweep sent the nose of the dory out of the channel.

"Come on," he called, leaping to the beach.

"But—but, Hortie—I can't get ashore here. I'll wet my white shoes."

"Jump."

"It's too far. Pull the boat higher on the sand."

"Not on your life. Jump, darling! I'll catch you."

She stood up in the bow.

"I can't. It's too far."

"Nonsense! Where's your sporting blood? Don't be afraid. I'm right here."

"Suppose you shouldn't catch me?"

"But I shall."

He would. She was certain of it. Still she wavered.

"I don't want to jump," she pouted.

"You'll have to. Come on, Beautiful. You're wasting time."

"I think you are perfectly horrid," she flung out as she sprang forward.

An instant later she was in his arms and tight in a grip she knew herself powerless to loosen.

"Let me go, Hortie! Let me go!" she pleaded.

"I shall, sweetheart. All in good time. Before I set you free, though, we must settle one trivial point. Are we engaged or are we not?"

She made no answer.

"If we're not," he went on, "I intend to duck you in the water. If we are, you shall tell me you love me and go free."

A swift, shy smile illuminated her face.

"I—I—don't want to be ducked, Hortie," she murmured, raising her arms to his neck.

"You precious thing! You shan't be. Now the rest of it. Say you love me."

"I guess you know that."

"But I wish to hear you say it."

"I—I—think I do."

"That's a half-hearted statement."

"I—I—know I do, Hortie."

"Ah, that is better. And I love you, Sylvia. Loving you is an old, old story with me—a sort of habit. I shall never change. You are too much a part of me, Sylvia. Now pay the boatman and you shall go. One is too cheap. Two is miserly. The fare is three. I won't take less."

"I consider your methods despicable," announced the girl when at last he reluctantly put her down on her feet. "You blackmailed me."

"I know my Sylvia," he countered. "Perhaps you'd rather I trundled back to New York tomorrow and offered the ring to Estelle."

"Silly! I was only fooling," she protested quickly, linking her arm in his. "This ring would never fit Estelle, dearest. Her hands are tremendous. Didn't you ever notice them? They are almost as large as a man's. I never saw such hands."

"She's an awful nice girl just the same."

"I don't doubt that. Come. We must quit fooling now and hurry or we shall never get home. Marcia will be frantic."

"Marcia?"

"My aunt. I have so much to tell you I hardly know where to begin," sighed Sylvia. "Do listen carefully, for I need your advice."

"What about?"

"A lot of things. It is a long story. You see Marcia has fallen in love with a robber."

"A robber? Your aunt?"

"Uh-huh. I know it sounds odd, but you will understand it better after you have heard the details," nodded Sylivia. "This man, a jewel thief, came to our house one day shipwrecked and hurt, so we took him in. We didn't know then, of course, that he was a thief. Afterward, when we did, he was sick and we hadn't the heart to turn him out. In fact we couldn't have done it anyway. He was too fascinating. He was one of the most fascinating men you ever saw."

"He must have been," Horatio growled.

"Oh, he was. I myself almost lost my heart to him," confessed Sylvia earnestly. "Marcia did."

"Your aunt?"

"Yes. Don't look so horrified, Hortie. I realize it seems queer, unconventional; but you'll understand better when you see Marcia. She is no ordinary person."

"I shouldn't think she was."

Sylvia ignored the comment.

"Well, anyway, the robber hid the loot and of course Marcia and I did all we could to protect him.

"Then one day the Wilton sheriff heard over the radio there had been a jewel robbery on Long Island, and stumbling upon the hidden gems, arrested Mr. Heath."

"Mr. Heath?"

"The thief, Hortie! The thief! How can you be so stupid?"

"I get you now. You must admit, though, this is some story to understand."

"I know it sounds confused, but in reality it is perfectly simple if you'll just pay attention. Well," the girl hurried on, "I cannot stop to explain all the twists and turns but anyway, the sheriff brought the burglar to Wilton and Marcia is broken-hearted."

"Broken-hearted! I should think she'd be thankful to be rid of him."

"But you keep forgetting she's in love with him."

"Well, do you wonder I do? What kind of a woman is your aunt? What sort of a gang have you got in with anyhow?"

"Hush, Hortie! You mustn't talk like that," Sylvia declared. "This affair is too serious. Marcia and the—the—she and Mr. Heath love one another. It is terrible because, you see, he has a wife."

"I should call that a stroke of Providence, myself."

"Horatio, I think you are being very nasty. You are joking about something that is no joking matter."

"I beg your pardon, dear. I wasn't really joking. Don't be angry. But this yarn is unbelievable—preposterous," explained the man, taking her hand and gently caressing it.

"Let Me Go, Hortie! Let Me Go!"

"Well, when Mr. Heath went away from the Homestead, he left behind him a hundred dollars in payment for what Marcia had done for him. It almost killed her."

"She—she—thought she ought to have had more, you mean? A hundred dollars is quite a sum in these days. She would better have grabbed it tight and been thankful. My respect for this bandit chap is rising. I should call him an honest gentleman."

"It is useless to talk with you, Horatio—I can see that," Sylvia said, stiffening. "A delicate affair like this is evidently beyond your comprehension. You cannot seem to understand it. All you do is to make light of every word I say."

"I'm not making light. On the contrary I guess I am taking the situation far more seriously than you are. I don't like the moral tone of this place at all. It looks to me as if you had got into most undesirable surroundings. The sooner you are married to me, young woman, and out of here the better. As for this remarkable aunt of yours—"

"Stop, Horatio! Stop right where you are," bridled Sylvia. "One more word against Marcia and back home you go so fast you won't be able to see for dust. I'm in earnest, so watch your step."

"The woman has bewitched you," frowned Horatio.

"She has. She bewitches everybody. She'll bewitch you."

"Not on your life!"

"Wait and see. Mr. Heath will bewitch you, too."

"The—the—?"

"Yes, the burglar, bandit, thief—whatever you choose to call him. You'll admit it when you meet him. We are going there now."

"To—to—call?"

"To return the check I just told you about. You're the stupidest man I was ever engaged to, Horatio. Why can't you listen?"

"I am listening with all my ears."

"Then the trouble is with your imagination," Sylvia said in her loftiest tone.

They walked on in silence until presently the girl stopped before the gate of a small, weather-beaten cottage.

"Well, here we are at Elisha's," she remarked, turning in at the gate.

"What's he got to do with it?"

"Mercy, Hortie. You'll wear me to a shred. Elisha is the sheriff. I'm going to coax him to let us see the prisoner."

"You don't mean the chap is jailed here! My—!" he clapped his hand over his mouth. "Why, any red-blooded man could knock the whole house flat to the ground with a single blow of his fist. I'll bet I could."

"There wasn't any other place to put him."

"Well, if he stays incarcerated in a detention pen like this, he's a noble-minded convict—that's all I have to say."

They walked up the narrow clamshell path, bordered by iris and thrifty perennials.

As they did so, the sound of a radio drifted through the open window.

Sylvia peeped in.

Elisha, too intent on the music to hear her step, was sitting before the loud speaker, smoking.

"I've come to see Mr. Heath," she shouted above the wails of a crooning orchestra.

"I ain't sure as I'd oughter let you see him," hesitated Elisha.

"I'll take the responsibility."

"Wal—mebbe on second thought, 'twill do no harm," he drawled. "He's round on the back porch. I'd come with you warn't I waitin' for the news flashes."

"That's all right. I can find him."

"Say, who you got with you?" called the sheriff over his shoulder.

"He's nobody—just my fiance."

"Your what?"

"The man I am going to marry."

"You don't tell me! So you're gettin' married, are you? Good lookin' feller! I heard at the post office you had some chap in the offin'. But to let him see Mr. Heath—I dunno as 'twould be just—"

"Where I go Horatio goes," Sylvia retorted.

Elisha weakened.

"Wal, in that case—" he began.

She waited to hear no more.

"Come on, Hortie," she called.

Leaving Elisha absorbed in a saxophone solo, the two rounded the corner of the cottage and found themselves in the presence of Stanley Heath.

CHAPTER XII

"Sylvia!" he cried, springing up and advancing toward her with outstretched hand. "Sylvia! What a brick you are to come!"

Angry as she was, when face to face with him she could not resist the contagion of his smile.

"I'm glad to see you so well," she said. "This is Mr. Horatio Fuller of Alton City."

Horatio looked Heath up and down and then stepped forward and gripped his hand with unmistakable cordiality.

"Mighty glad to know you, sir," was his greeting. "You seem to have got yourself into a jam. If there is anything I can do—any way I can be of service—"

"Horatio, you forget we are not here to make a social call," interrupted Sylvia, who had by this time regained her routed chilliness and indignation. "On the contrary, Mr. Heath, we have come on a very painful errand. We are returning this check to you."

She extended it toward him, gingerly holding its corner in the tips of her fingers as if it were too foul a thing to touch. "It was outrageous of you, insulting, to leave a thing of this sort for Marcia—to attempt to pay in cash—kindness such as hers."

"I'm sorry," Heath stammered.

"Sorry! You couldn't have been very sorry, or you would have sensed such an act would hurt her terribly."

Horatio Fuller fumbled nervously with his tie.

"You deserve," swept on young Sylvia with rising spirit, "to be thrashed. Hortie and I both think so—don't we, Hortie?"

Horatio Junior turned crimson.

"Oh, I say, Sylvia, go easy!" he protested. "Don't drag me into this. I don't know one darn thing about it. Suppose I just step inside and listen to the news flashes while you and Mr. Heath transact your business. It will be less awkward all round. If you want me you can speak."

Nodding courteously in Heath's direction, Horatio Junior disappeared.

"Your Mr. Fuller is a man of nice feeling," Stanley Heath declared looking after him. "I congratulate you."

"Thank you."

"Everything is settled then?"

She nodded.

"I hope you will be very happy."

She did not reply at once. When she did, it was to say with a humility new and appealing:

Four "ins" and responsible for a great many traffic accidents Here they are:

1. Inattention
2. Inexperience
3. Incompetency
4. Indifference.

Inattention is probably the outstanding cause of motor vehicle deaths and injuries today. Inexperienced drivers with the new, modern machine with its highspeed mechanism constitute a menace to safety. Incompetency rules with inexperience; people who are inexperienced in the handling of these new automobiles are also incompetent.

Indifference constitutes a devil may care attitude. Some people feel that they must be first to the turn, first to the stop light and are indifferent to the rights of others. It is an utter lack of courtesy.

Bicentennial Will Be Marked

Minnesota has reached a stage in its history where not only centennials but bitentennials can be marked. During the coming summer will occur the two-hundreth anniversary of the massacre by Indians on an island in the Lake of the Woods of Jean Baptiste la Verendrye, Father Aulneau, and nineteen voyageurs.

The twenty-one Frenchmen had left Fort St. Charles, on what is now the Northwest Angle of the Lake of the Woods, only a few days before their tragic deaths. They were a part of a party of trading explorers who had been occupying the fort for about four years under the leadership of Jean Baptiste's father, the Sieur de la Verendrye. When supplies were needed at this remote post, it became necessary for the leader to send an expedition to the east to bring back provisions. But the members of this expedition got only as far as an island in the lake on which they had been living. There, after they had beached their canoes, they were surprised by a Sioux war party and all were killed.

When La Verendrye learned what had happened, he was grief-stricken. He had the bodies of his son and the priest and the skulls of the voyageurs removed to Fort St. Charles and buried beneath the chapel. There these grim remains were found in 1908, when the site of the fort was located by a party of Canadians. The resting place of these valiant Minnesota trail blazers is now marked by a high cross. Plans are under way for appropriatetly commemorating their part in the exploration of northern Minnesota during this bicentennial year.

Pay Schedule For Soil Program

Payments available to Minnesota farmers for "soil-building" practices in 1936, under the new federal soil program, have recently been approved by the Secretary of Agriculture and transmitted to the county soil conservation committee.

Farmers have been waiting this information to use in figuring their possible secondary payments, which will be in addition to the $10 per acre, more or less, according to the productivity of the soil, which they will receive for shifting from soil-depleting to soil-building and soil-conserving crops. In general, the soil-depleting crops are those which are comparatively "hard" on the land, whereas the soil-conserving and soil-building crops are those which tend to maintain or increase soil fertility.

The schedule of "soil-building" payments, in amounts per acre, is as follows:

Two dollars for alfalfa: $1 for medium or mammoth red clover; $1 for alsike, sweet or white clover; and $1.50 for soybeans plowed under as green manure. To qualify as "soil-building", all of the foregoing crops must be seeded on crop land between October 1, 1835 and September 30, 1936.

In addition, $2.50 per acre will be paid when crop land or pasture is limited at the rate of 2 tons per acre between January 1, and September 30, 1636.

The total of all secondary payments the farmer may receive, however, may not exceed $1 for every acre of soil building and soil conserving crops grown on his farm in 1936 Mr. Reierson explains. Thus, although the farmer might lime and seed 10 acres to red clover in 1936, he would not be eligible to receive the full secondary payment of $40 ($2.50 plus $1.50 times 10) unless he should grow on his farm this year at least 40 acres of new and old-crop tame grasses and legumes (40 acres at $1 per acre equals $40.)

Farmers wishing for a more detailed explanation of the program and how it will affect their individual farms are advised to consult the county agent, or members of the county or community committees.

Too often the automobile driver feels that he has unlimited rights on the highways. He feels that a mere pedestrian is something to detest and not respect.

The pedestrian does have some rights after all.

The United States Supreme Court has decreed that once a pedestrian has started across the street with the "go" light, he cannot be charged with contributory negligence for failure to observe light changes while crossing. The obligation rests upon the motorist to wait uutil the crossing is clear, and failure to do so constitutes negligence on his part.

Let us give the pedestrian every chance and opportunity to get across the street safely. Even tho they may not be right in their crossing, let us be courteous - - and save a life.

—16—

"I shall be. I never appreciated Hortie until now. I was too silly, vain—feather-headed. I have realized it since knowing Marcia."

"We all want to be different after we have seen Marcia," Stanley Heath said gently.

"We don't just want to be—we set about it," was the girl's grave reply.

"Sit down, Sylvia, and let us talk of Marcia," ventured Heath after a pause. "I am deeply sorry if I have wounded her—indeed I am."

The girl searched his face.

"I cannot understand you, Mr. Heath," she said. "What has Marcia done that you should have left her as you did? Hasn't she believed in you through thick and thin? Stood up for you against everybody—going it blind at that? Few women would have had such faith in a stranger."

"I realize that. You do not need to tell me," he answered. "It is precisely because she has gone so far I believed her capable of going farther yet—the whole way."

"What do you mean by the whole way?"

"To the end."

"Well, hasn't she?"

He shook his head.

"No. She has fallen short—disappointed me cruelly. When it came to the final test, her affection collapsed. Oh, she has been wonderful," he added quickly. "Do not think I fail to appreciate that. She has far out-distanced every other woman I ever have known. I simply expected too much of her, doubtless the impossible. Human nature is frail—a woman's heart the frailest thing of all. I have always said so."

"You wrong Marcia," cried Sylvia hotly. "Her heart is not frail. Neither is she the weak sort of person you have pictured. In all the world you could not match her loyalty or the depth of her affection. If after the experience we three have lived through together you have not discovered what she is, it is futile for me to attempt to show you.

"You came into our lives like a meteor—entirely detached from everything. We knew nothing about you and in the face of damaging evidence you offered neither Marcia nor me one word of explanation. Marcia asked none. Without rhyme or reason she believed in you. I had not her faith. I freely confess I thought you guilty. Oh, I liked you sufficiently well to be ready to help you save your skin. But Marcia cared enough for you to want you to save your soul.

"When you were taken ill, we both nursed you—I willingly, she devotedly. Here lay another difference had you been able to detect it. What happened as a result of this enforced intimacy? You know—know far better than I."

"I fell in love with Marcia," replied the man without an instant's hesitation.

"You fell in love!" Sylvia repeated, her lip curling. "You call it love—the poor thing you offered her! Why, Marcia would have gone to the world's end with you, Stanley Heath, had she the right. She would have faced any humiliation for your sake. If prison doors closed upon you, she would have remained faithful until they swung open and afterward followed you to any corner of the earth in which you chose to begin a new life."

"That's where you're wrong, Sylvia," contradicted Heath. "Marcia was not ready to do that. I tried her out and she refused. When I told her I should return to her, and asked her in so many words whether she was willing to face shame and public scorn for my sake she turned her back on me. She could not go to that length."

"Are you sure she understood?" asked Sylvia, stepping nearer and looking fearlessly into his eyes. "There is a shame Marcia never in this world would face for any man; but it is not the shame you have just described.

"It is the shame of wronging another woman; destroying a home. In the villages where we have been brought up, we believe in marriage as a sacred, enduring sacrament—not a bond to be lightly broken. When you offered Marcia less than that—"

"I never offered Marcia any such shameful position, Sylvia," cried Stanley Heath. "I would not so far insult her."

"But you are married."

"That is a lie. Who told you so?"

"The—the wire to Mrs. Stanley Heath—the telephone message. I heard you call her Joan."

"But, Sylvia, Mrs. Stanley Heath is not my wife. She is my young stepmother, my father's widow. I always have called her Joan."

"Oh! I beg your pardon."

"I see it all now," the man explained. "You have entirely misunderstood the situation. I'm a Junior. Since my father's death, however, people have got out of the way of using the term. Sometimes I myself am careless about it. So Marcia thought—"

"Of course she did. We both did. How were we to know?" Sylvia demanded.

"How, indeed? If an innocent citizen cannot visit a town without being arrested as a criminal within a week of his arrival, why shouldn't he be married without his knowledge. Circumstantial evidence can, apparently, work wonders."

Then suddenly he threw back his head and laughed.

"Bless you, little Sylvia—bless you for setting me right. I told you you were a brick and you've proved it. Thanks to you, everything is now straightened out. Here, give me your hand. How am I to thank you for what you have done? I only hope that young Horatio Fuller of yours realizes what a treasure he is getting."

"He does, Mr. Heath—he does," observed that gentleman, strolling at the same instant through the door and encircling his tiny bride-to-be with his arm. "Haven't I traveled half way across this big country of ours to marry her?"

"Oh, we're not going to be married yet, Hortie," demurred the girl trying to wrench herself free of the big fellow's hold.

"Certainly we are, my dear. Didn't I tell you this morning I came to get married? I was perfectly serious. Dad gave me two months vacation with that understanding. I must either produce a wife when I get home or lose my job."

"Looks to me as if you had Mr. Fuller's future prosperity in your hands, Sylvia," Heath said.

"She has. She can make or break me. A big responsibility, eh, little Sylvia?"

"I know it, Hortie," retorted the girl seriously.

"She is equal to it, Fuller—never fear," Stanley Heath asserted.

"I'm not doing any worrying," smiled Horatio. "I—"

The sentence was cut short by the radio's loudspeaker:

"The much sought Long Island gem thief was captured this morning at his lodgings in Jersey City. Harris Chalmers, alias Jimmie O'Hara, a paroled prisoner, was taken by the police at his room on K— street. A quantity of loot, together with firearms and the missing jewels were found concealed in the apartment. The man readily admitted the theft. He has a long prison record."

For a second nobody spoke.

Then as if prompted by common impulse, the three on the piazza rushed indoors.

Elisha was sitting limply before the radio.

"Did you hear that?" he gasped.

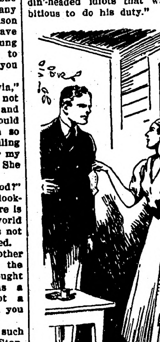
"Well, rather!" Horatio Fuller shouted with a triumphant wave of his hand.

"Ain't it the beateree?" exploded the astonished sheriff. "That sends the whole case up in the air. All that's needed now to make me out the darndest fool on God's earth is for Eleazer's young nephew-lawyer in New York, who's checking up Heath's story, to wire everything there is O. K. If he does, I'll go bury my head. There goes the telephone! That's him! That's Eleazer—I'll bet a hat.

"Hello!—Yes, I heard it.—You ain't surprised? Wal, I am. I'm took off my feet.—Oh, your nephew wired, did he, an' everything's O. K.? That bein' the case, I reckon there's no more to be said. I feel like a shrimp. How do you feel?—"

Elisha hung up the receiver.

"Wal, Mr. Heath, the story you told Eleazer an' me is straight as a string in every particular," he announced. "You're free! There ain't nothin' I can say. To tell you I'm sorry ain't in no way adequate. You'll just have to set me down as one of them puddin'-headed idiots that was over-ambitious to do his duty."



"It Was Outrageous of You, Insulting, to Leave a Thing of This Sort for Marcia."

"I shall not let it go at that, Mr. Winslow," Stanley Heath acclaimed, stepping to the old man's side and seizing his palm in a strong grip. "We all make errors. Forget it. I'm going to. Besides, you have treated me like a prince since I've been your guest."

"You are the prince, sir. Livin' with you has shown me that. Wal, anyhow, all ain't been lost. At least I've met a thoroughbred an' that ain't none too frequent an occurrence in these days."

"What I can't understand, Mr. Winslow, is why you didn't recognize he was a thoroughbred from the beginning," Horatio Fuller remarked.

"You've a right to berate me, young man—a perfect right. I ain't goin' to put up no defense. 'Twas the circumstances that blinded me. Besides, I had only a single glimpse of Mr. Heath. Remember that. After he was took sick I never saw him again. Had we got acquainted, as we have now, everything would 'a' been different. Findin' them jewels—"

"Great hat, man! I had a diamond ring in my pocket when I came to Wilton, but that didn't prove I'd stolen it."

"I know! I know!" acquiesced the sheriff. "Eleazer an' me lost our bearin's entirely. We got completely turned round."

"A thief with a Phi Beta Kappa key!" jeered Horatio. "Godfrey!" Then turning to Sylvia, he added in an undertone: "Well, so far as I can see the only person who has kept her head through this affair is our Aunt Marcia."

Elisha overheard the final clause.

"That's right!" he agreed with cordiality. "The Widder's head-piece can always be relied upon to stay steady."

"Whose head-piece?" inquired Stanley Heath, puzzled by the term.

"Marcia's. Here in town we call her The Widder."

"Well, you'll not have the opportunity to call her that much longer," Heath laughed.

"You don't tell me!" Elisha regarded him, open-mouthed. "Humph! So that's how the wind blows, is it? Wal, I can see this mix-up would 'a' ended my chances anyway. Marcia'd never have had me after this. Disappointed as I am, though, there's a sight of comfort in knowin' she won't have Eleazer neither. He don't come out of the shindy a whit better'n me. That's somethin'. In fact it's a heap!"

CHAPTER XIII

Intense as was the joy of the three persons, who a little later set out toward the Homestead in the old yellow dory, they were a silent trio.

Too much of seriousness had happened during the morning for them to dispel its aftermath lightly.

Horatio, pulling at the oars, was unusually earnest, Sylvia turned the ring on her finger reflectively and Stanley Heath looked far out over the water, too deep in thought to be conscious of either of them.

When, however, the boat swung into the channel, Sylvia spoke.

"Hortie and I are not coming with you, Mr. Heath," she said. "We will stay behind. Only do, please, promise me one thing. Do not tell Marcia the whole story before we have a chance to hear it. There are ever so many connecting links I am curious beyond words to have you supply."

"Such as—?"

"The jewels in the first place. I can hardly wait to have that mystery solved."

Stanley laughed.

"The jewels are no mystery at all. I can satisfy your mind about those here and now. They were Joan's—Mrs. Heath's. Her maid, Corinne, took them and disappeared. Soon afterward, purely by accident, I met Paul Latimer, a friend who lives on Long Island, and during the course of our conversation, he asked if I knew a good man servant, saying that Julien, their butler, had just given notice that he was to be married to Corinne, the new parlor maid, and return with her to France.

"The woman's name instantly caught my attention.

"Why shouldn't I do a bit of sleuthing on my own account?

"Thus far the detectives Joan and I had hired had made no headway at locating the jewels.

"Why shouldn't I have a try at it myself? I got a boat and cruised along to the Latimers' at whose house I had frequently stayed, and with the habits of whose household I was familiar. My plan was to arrive early in the morning before the family was astir and catch the parlormaid alone at her work.

"Should she prove to be our Corinne, I would boldly confront her with the theft and demand the jewels; if, on the other hand, she turned out to be another person altogether, it would be perfectly easy to explain my presence by falling back on my acquaintance with Paul.

"It seemed, on thinking the matter over, that this would be a far more considerate course anyway than to drag in the detectives, not only because I had no real evidence to present to them, but also because of my friendship for the Latimers and for Julien, who had been in their employ many years. I knew they esteemed him very highly and would be dreadfully cut up should they find him involved in an affair as unpleasant as this one. Besides, I felt practically certain he had had nothing to do with the crime. He was too fine—one of the old-fashioned, devoted type of servant.

"To shame such a man and throw suspicion on him if he were blameless would be a pity, especially just on the eve of his resigning from service. It might mean that instead of leaving with the gratitude and good-will of his employers, he might be sent away under a cloud. I did not wish that to happen.

"Well, my scheme worked to a dot.

"I reached the Latimers' unobserved; found Corinne alone straightening up the library; faced her and demanded the jewels.

"The instant she saw me she knew the game was up, and, without more ado, produced the gems from her pocket, shouldering all the blame.

"Julien, she protested, knew nothing of the theft. He was a self-respecting, honest man. Should he be told of what she had done it would end everything between them. She loved him. Indeed it was because of him she had committed the crime.

"It proved they had been engaged some time and long before had agreed to save their money and sometime pool it so they might be married and buy a little home in France.

As Told to:

FRANK E. HAGAN and ELMO SCOTT WATSON

The Double Tragedy

A FEW years ago a group of forty Chicago and Milwaukee newspaper men were guests of the Milwaukee railroad and Rocky Wolfe, now a widely known radio sport commentator, on a week-end outing in Manitowish, Wis.

Among the extraordinary sights of the resort town were live porcupines strolling about a nine-hole golf course played by the scribes and a mother hawk, whose broad back and spread wings were used by three baby hawks as a landing stage, high above ground.

A dormant appreciation of Nature having been awakened in the minds of the visiting city folks, they were treated by Wolfe to the prize story of the vicinity.

A Manitowish hunter, according to Rocky, reported that he had shot a fox which had a dead porcupine in its mouth. The fox was already dead when shot, for the spines of the porcupine had killed it.

It was learned later, Rocky averred, that the porcupine had been a pet which earned a living by carrying fruit on its back from its owner's orchard to the cider mill.

"And I am ashamed to report, gentlemen," Wolfe concluded, "that both animals were intoxicated when the double tragedy occurred."

The Colorado Cinder Beetle

WHEN the Santa Fe railroad was built into Colorado, its coming brought rejoicing to the residents of the rich Arkansas River valley. It meant an outlet for their crops and prosperity. But that lasted only a little while. Then disaster swept down upon them.

Every night a large section of the roadbed disappeared. Something was taking away the cinder ballast. Train schedules were disrupted and there were endless delays until the damage could be repaired. In several cases freight trains were wrecked or derailed.

Santa Fe officials were frantic, for no one could discover what was carrying away the ballast. Finally a newspaper man, Charley Blakesley of the Kansas City Star, suggested that possibly the Colorado cinder beetle was eating up the ballast and his surmise proved correct.

How to check the ravages of the insects was the next problem. That was solved when it was discovered that the cinders used for ballast were from soft coal. So hard coal cinders were substituted and the cinder beetles broke their jaws trying to eat them. For some time, it is said, passengers on the Santa Fe were kept awake at nights by the cinder beetles screaming with the pain of their broken jaws. So the railroad speeded up the schedules of their passenger trains. They now went so fast that the passengers heard the moaning of the broken-jawed cinder beetles merged into a symphony of sound, like the rustle of wind through pine trees, that quickly lulled them to sleep.

When a hardier race of cinder beetles developed with jaws capable of eating hard coal cinders, the Santa Fe was ready for them. They began using crushed rock and since that time have had no trouble with the little pests.

Massachusetts Melons

THE visitor from Georgia motoring through the Berkshires of Massachusetts looked rather scornfully at the crops in the fields along the road.

"Why, I don't see any melons up here," he said to the farmer leaning on the fence. "Can't you raise them?"

"No, we don't seem to have any luck with melons," replied the Yankee. "I tried to raise some a while back—tried it year after year, but I couldn't ever get a good crop somehow. The trouble was that the soil was just too rich for 'em.

"I'd plant my seeds, the vines would start growing, the blossoms would come out, and then they'd set and the melons would begin to form. Then the sun would get hotter and the nights would sprinkle our Berkshire dew on 'em. And that dew, I tell you, acts like magic, it makes things grow so. But I never could get any melons, though."

"Is that so?" exclaimed the Southerner, "Why couldn't you?"

"Well, I tell you," answered the son of the Berkshires. "Those vines just naturally grew so fast they dragged the melons all over the field. They just plumb wore 'em out before they had a chance to get ripe. So I just had to give up tryin' to raise melons."

"Marine Store Dealer"

When a sailing ship came into port in the old days a man used to go aboard and bid for the old sails that had been torn by tropical storms. He was also given odd lengths of rope and all the junk accumulated during a voyage of many months. "Marine store dealer" was the man's title, and he dealt with ships which sailed the Seven seas. Later there was little for the marine store dealer to do—the big shipping lines managed their own affairs. As his trade with ships went, the dealer started to buy rags, old bottles and the like from houses in seaport towns. Now he has become the unromantic rag-and-bone man—though still his official name is marine store dealer.—Pearson's Weekly

Who Are You?

❀

The Romance of Your Name

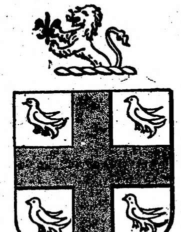
By
RUBY HASKINS ELLIS

A Terry?

IT IS supposed that this name originated in France, from Terris, Therry, Thierry and was brought to England with the Norman Conquest, and from there to Ireland and other countries. If this is correct, it would be classified as a "place name."

The coat of arms given here is credited to Charles Terry of Boston, Mass., 1777, who traced ancestry to the Terrys of Bradford, in Yorkshire, England.

A number of Terrys came to New England in the first days of colonization. John Terry is on record as an early settler of Dorchester, Mass., having arrived in this country in 1635. He later moved to Windsor, Conn.



Richard Terry came in 1635 from London, settled in New England, was accepted as a freeman in Southold, L. I., 1662. His brother, Robert, also came in 1635.

Thomas Terry, born in England in 1607, came in 1635 and settled in Braintree, Mass., later moving to Southold, L. I.; he also was a freeman of the colony.

Many descendants of these early settlers are to be found in New England as well as many other states today. The records of the early struggles of other colonists bear testimony of the service and worth contributed to the founding of our country by Terrys. Those same sturdy qualities have endured through each generation.

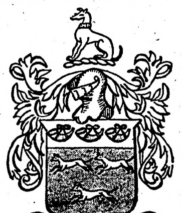
A Hunter?

THE coat of arms here shown belongs to the Hunters of Hunterston, County Ayr, Scotland, whose descendants are to be found in great numbers in this country. The motto, "I accomplish my course," is characteristic of this splendid family, for it has always been one of great undertakings and brilliant accomplishment.

The Anglo-Saxon spelling of this name was "Hunta," of the German "Hunder," both meaning a hunter by occupation. The family was established in County Ayr, Scotland, for many generations. They and their descendants lay claim to noble blood, tracing their ancestry to Edward I, king of England.



This family has produced many distinguished men and women both in Great Britain and America. Dr. John Hunter was the discoverer of the circulation of the blood; Andrew Hunter was an eminent professor of divinity of Edinburgh, Scotland. There have been many surgeons, artists and authors in the family.

There were in the Continental army during our struggle for independence a great many officers by the name of Hunter. Descendants of these men may claim eligibility to prominent patriotic societies.

Among the first of the Hunters to come to the New England colony were Christian, Elizabeth, Thomas and William, who were all passengers on the good ship Blessing.

John Hunter was living in New Haven, Conn., in 1644.

Joseph Hunter was a resident of Nantucket, Mass., in 1766. Most of the Hunters are of the Presbyterian faith.

Lard used in deep fat frying should be strained through cheesecloth after use to remove the food particles which accumulate in the kettle.

Smart Silk Prints for Young Girls

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

Youth and Gay Print

FOR as refreshing and lovely a threesome as ever fancy can picture, we suggest the alliance of springtime, youth and gay silk print. In the new season's style parade it is very evident that designers of young-girl fashions are all enthusiasm over joyous colorful printed silk crepes and silk taffetas.

Agreed that pretty young girls and happy bright prints belong together, the next logical step is to plan the wardrobe of Miss Sweet Sixteen and her younger sisters accordingly. To secure satisfaction in selection of a voguish silk print for the junior miss be sure that it be as practical as it is attractive. Meaning, one should choose from standpoint of wearability as well as intrigue of color and patterning. See to it that the silk you are buying is that sterling it will not pull at the seams or crumple because of artificial weighting. Only good silks can be depended upon to dry-clean like new, while many of them may be tubbed with perfect confidence in a happy outcome. Which accounts for an ever increasing demand for pure dye all-silk prints instead of shoddy weaves that make a grand "first appearance" and then begin to lose their glamor from the day they are worn. More and more women are coming to realize the economy of getting the best.

Printed silk crepe is a favorite for practical daytime wear. The key to silk prints for spring and summer is color in vivid, virile hues as inspired by Van Gogh, celebrated Spanish painter. Of course if pastels are your choice you will find them most delectable in the new showings, otherwise take a fling at high color this season and be smartly in fashion.

Silk crepe in red with white and black bubble print, as shown to the right in the illustration, lends itself admirably to the spring costuming of a young girl. The skirt of this chic outfit is pleated. Red buttons and a boutonniere animate the gray coat. The coat is extremely practical in that it can be worn as a separate wrap, and a high-style wrap it will be, for gray is a most talked of color. Gray shoes, gray hats, gray weaves, gray summer furs are made a feature in many fashion previews.

It is indeed a dainty silken frock which the smiling young miss to the left in the group is wearing. Tiny crossed golf clubs designfully pattern this simply tailored silk crepe frock. Novel patterning distinguishes the new silks. Most amusing and very smart are the silks with little animal figures, flying birds, music notes and the newest is vegetable prints with of course a comprehensive showing of florals. Tiny floweret print crepes are charming for little girls. White crochet buttons give an exclusive hand-made touch to the cunning dress pictured.

Before the season is far spent every young girl will be coveting a bolero costume such as are outstandingly fashionable at present. So see to it that the young girl's wardrobe includes a bolero outfit to wear in the spring style parade. Prints made up in bolero fashion are a "last word" in swank. The model which the little lady seated in the foreground is wearing is made of printed taffeta. The blouse of French blue silk crepe is gathered to the skirt. The jacket is removable and the collar and cuffs of the blouse are worn outside. Notice the short puffed sleeves of the jacket. The jacket, either Eton, bolero or of basque with a peplum persuasion made of printed taffeta worn with a plain skirt is a high fashion for spring.

JACKET BLOUSE

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

The blouse that looks like a jacket, made of gay print and worn with a monotone skirt for striking contrast, is a foremost fashion this season. Tailored, yet withal delightfully feminine, is the model pictured. It is made of a Sumatra cotton print and its tropical coloring is fascinating. The band-collar ends in a little tab tie. Similar banding finishes the full short puff sleeves. Wear the blouse tucked inside or out over the skirt—the new bolero suits call for the former.

Concealed Buttons

The coat with fly-front (buttons concealed under a stitched panel of cloth) is a new idea for spring. One particularly good model of this type comes in soft navy blue woolen.

Hunting Cap Hats

Hunting caps have given the inspiration for new Paris hats. They come in flat fur or velvet.

THREE-PIECE SUIT HOLDS HIGH PLACE

Because it is smart and practical, the three-piece suit has always held a high place in the feminine wardrobes. Outstanding in this mode is an attractive ensemble of soft wool in small checks of biege and wine red. Four patch pockets, cut on the bias, trim the tailored jacket which is styled with erect revers and a belt of wine red leather.

The knee-length overcoat is cut on swagger lines with mannish revers. With the ensemble is worn a red velour hat, wine and beige silk scarf and other accessories of wine red.

New Petit Point Luggage Recalls Old Carpet Bags

Reminiscent of the carpet bag our forefathers carried are the modern pieces of petit point luggage.

These bags, fashioned from petit point and leather, are light enough to please the airplane traveler and handsome enough to delight the most fastidious. Incidentally, a petit point make-up and overnight case harmonizes nicely with any other type of luggage.

You might keep this in mind the next time you start out to buy gifts.

Newest Type Shirtwaist to Wear With Spring Suit

While it contrives to maintain a skirtwaist aspect, the newest type to wear with the spring tailored suit, takes on beguilingly feminine lace edging and frills. Those with bosom fronts formed row-and-row of tiny frills or lace edging are favorites. They have youthful turnover collars either pleated or with round corners and lace-edged. The very latest in sleeves is the short puff with bandings of lace or pleated sheer.

Angel Robes

Some of the novelties featured in the fall openings in Paris were long monk's capes, angel robe evening gowns and floating Grecian draperies.

FLOYD GIBBONS Adventurers' Club

Hello Everybody!

"A Grave in Russia"

By FLOYD GIBBONS
Famous Headline Hunter.

THIS is the story of why Donia Santanovsky of Bronx, N. Y., came to America. It is also the story of why Donia is afraid of snow. That's a funny sort of fear, especially as Donia came here from Russia where they have plenty of that cold, white stuff that powders the earth in winter.

But then, if you'd gone through what Donia did, over there in the little village of Shulac, near the city of Kiev—well—maybe you'd be afraid of snow, too. I know that if it had happened to me, I'd move down on the Equator where I'd never even have to think of the doggone stuff.

In the winter of 1919 Donia lived in that little village of Shulac that I just mentioned. She lived there alone with her mother, for her father had been killed in the World war.

The Times Were Hard, Even for Russia.

Those were bad times in Russia. The Czarist government had fallen, and there was little real law in the land. Not much order, either. Roving bands pillaged the country. Bandits were everywhere.

And worst of all were the Cossacks, those half savage soldiers of the former czar. Wherever they went they robbed and terrorized. Especially they terrorized the Jews wherever they found them.

That, of course, was nothing new. Even under the czars there had been anti-Jewish riots, most of them instigated and carried on by these same Cossacks. Now, though, they were even less restrained than they had been in the old days of the monarchy. Jews were robbed, beaten, tortured and killed. They have a name for those slaughters over there. They call them "pogroms."

"The Cossacks Are Coming" Was Bad News.

Donia and her mother lived in constant fear of these pogroms. They were the only Jewish family in the neighborhood—the only one within a radius of five miles about their little village. And one night, as Donia lay in bed with a high fever there came an ominous knocking at the door. When Donia's mother opened it she saw a peasant, shaking with fear, who cried out the dreaded warning, "The Cossacks are coming."

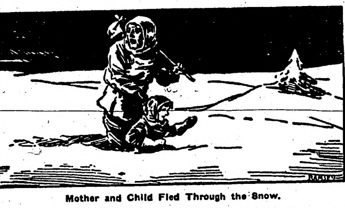
Donia's mother became pale with terror. Donia started to cry. She was only six years old then—not much more than a baby. But the Cossacks didn't spare even children when they were out on their savage forays.

Fever or no fever, Donia was taken out of bed. Her mother wrapped her in some blankets and, dragging her by the hand, started for the house of a Christian neighbor where they could hide until the Cossacks had gone.

It was a bitter cold night. It had been snowing steadily for days. It was hard going through the drifts, and the neighbor's house was a mile away. But Donia's mother hurried on, going as fast as the drifts would let her, and dragging little Donia along by the hand.

They Seek Refuge in the Frozen Tundras.

They had almost reached their destination when they heard the beat of horses' hoofs far up the road. The Cossacks were on them! There wasn't time to reach the house where they were to find shelter. Hardly time for anything at all. Donia's mother looked around for a place to hide. The bare, treeless landscape stretched away, bleak and shelterless. There was no place to hide but one—and that might mean death for little fever-stricken Donia.



Mother and Child Fled Through the Snow.

There wasn't any choice. Better an easy death than the tortures of the Cossacks. Better a death from pneumonia than the fiendish cruelty of the horsemen who were riding toward them. Donia's mother got down on her knees and began scooping a hole in the snowdrift at the side of the road. She tore cloth from her skirt and put it over their faces so they could breathe. Then she put Donia in the hole she had scooped out, lay down beside her and began covering them both with snow.

They Hide Under the Cossacks' Very Eyes.

They had no sooner finished than the Cossacks rode up. They came right up to the spot where Donia and her mother lay buried in the snow—and stopped! Mother and daughter held their breaths. Had they been discovered? Had the sharp eyes of the Cossacks read the marks and prints in the snow?

But no. The Cossacks, it seems, hadn't noticed their hiding place. They had just stopped to talk. For endless minutes they chattered while Donia and her mother wondered how long they'd have to lie there motionless under that cold blanket of snow.

Time dragged on. Donia's mother felt that she was freezing. Donia long since had stiffened and lost consciousness at her mother's side. Then, at last, the Cossacks climbed back on their horses. Hoofbeats rattled off down the road.

The Cossacks had gone—but it seemed to Donia's mother that they had gone too late. Her little girl, all stiff and blue, lay motionless in the snow bank. She picked her up and carried her to the neighbor's house, convinced that she was dead.

But Donia wasn't dead. She lived to tell us her story. And soon after that escape she and her mother came to America. They didn't want any more experiences like that—no more adventures with Cossacks, and with the cold snows of Russia.

Matthias Hohner, Maker of the First Harmonica

Matthias Hohner, the father of the harmonica, was born at Trossingen, in the province of Baden, in 1833. At the time, the few peasants who lived in the village went out daily to work in their fields and were just able to scrape together a meager existence from the already worn-out soil, and the village was just like many thousand other villages throughout Europe. The only handwork possible was clock-making, though the section renowned for its clock-making lies farther north, and the clock-makers of Trossingen had no better success than the farmers, because they had no market for their clocks.

Matthias Hohner was the son of a clock-maker and learned the trade from his father. For many years he was as poor as his neighbors. But he possessed several qualities rare among easy-going South Germans; a strong will, stubborn determination, unlimited vitality, the ability to think quickly and shrewdly; and, in addition to these, an able and helpful wife. In 1827 a Viennese clock-maker fastened some rough strips of metal to a wooden base so that when one blew on them they gave out tones. The instrument was primitive—no covering for the metal tongs, no clear and harmonious tones, and no possibilities of being used in any other way than as a sort of noisy whistle, says a writer in Pearson's Weekly.

Mathias Hohner heard of this insignificant invention. He set out to make a similar instrument for himself, having the idea that the metal strips might be filed to various thicknesses and lengths and thus make a chromatic scale possible.

While working on his instrument he discovered that constant blowing was not so practical, and he decided to fasten alternate strips at the top instead of at the bottom so that the player might inhale as well as blow, thus making the playing of the instrument merely a process of controlled breathing. Then he designed a protective covering for the fragile vibrating tongues of his invention, and the first harmonica was complete.

Victoria, B. C.—After 90 days of continual yawning, Mrs. P. E. Wakelin, resident here, appears now to be recovering. The yawning attacks started last September when her husband cracked a joke. Mrs. Wakelin laughed. Then yawned—and for 90 days she continued yawning at intervals of four or five seconds. She is still yawning—but at longer intervals. Mrs. Wakelin has not lacked advice. She has received an enormous "yawn" mail and letters are still arriving at the rate of 40 a day.

TOMB OF SAINT IS RIFLED BY BANDITS

Vienna Church Is Invaded by Impious Robbers.

Vienna, Austria.—The tomb of St. Josaphat, a Roman Catholic saint, in Vienna's St. Barbara church, has been pilaged.

The glass shrine on the altar, containing the relics of the saint, was broken by burglars, and a heavy golden chain with a cross, the pious donation of Archduke William, was stolen.

Josaphat was a Catholic Basilian monk who became archbishop of Polock, eastern Poland, in the early Sixteenth century.

In 1623 he was killed by rival Russian Pravoslavian priests in a fight between Catholic Ukrainians and Pravoslav Russians.

The tomb of Josaphat, who was beatified 20 years after his death and subseqently canonized, soon became the center of pilgrimage for Roman Catholic Ukrainians.

During the war between Sweden and Russia in the late Seventeenth century, which largely was fought in that region, the bones of the saint had to be moved frequently to thwart thieves and desecrators.

After the war they were restored to their original shrine in Polock, but did not remain there long.

When Czar Peter the Great, in his efforts to suppress an uprising of the Ukrainians, threatened to burn the relics of their national saint, a Prince Radziwill secretly transfered them in 1705 to Biala, where he founded a Basilian monastery and a church in hoonr of the saint.

There they rested for more than a century and a half in a beautiful silver coffin under the main altar.

The coffin disappeared during the Polish uprising against the czars in the early 60s of the last century.

In 1917 when the district was occupied by Austrian troops an old peasant appeared before the Austrian commander and told him that the saint's bones had been immured under the Biala church.

There they were found, but without the silver casket, and Emperor Charles had them transferred to St. Barbara's church in Vienna.

A wealthy Canadian family of French extraction by which the saint was held in particular veneration provided the new silver and glass case, and Archduke William, who was a pretender to the throne of Ukrainia, gave the golden chain and cross which were stolen so recently.

Talking Kettle Mystery Solved by Repair Man

Portland, Ore.—The ghastliest crime thriller of them all couldn't hold a candle to Portland's "mystery of mysteries." For instance:

Suddenly, in the dead of night, the lights would flicker, glow brightly for a few minutes and then slowly fade out.

The teakettle talked.

And worst of all, the washbowl in the bathroom whispered!

It looked like another "haunted house" was about to join the list, when a "radio doctor" saved the day.

He noticed a similarity between the teakettle's voice and the voice of an amateur radio operator next door. A check of the teakettle's conversation and the operator's broadcast verified his suspicions. A further check revealed the queer goings-on occurred only when the operator was transmitting on 80 meters.

The radio doctor's explanation was a bit technical, but left no doubt as to the cause of the odd incidents.

Yellowstone Park, Wyo.—C. A. Lord, park engineer, had a narrow escape from death when he was attacked by two gigantic Rocky mountain sheep while driving cautiously along an ice-coated mountain road. One of the passengers in the automobile was knocked into Lord's lap, but no one was injured.

Aqueduct 242 Miles Long Has 92 Miles of Tunnels

The entire Colorado river aqueduct is 242 miles long, but in the system there are, along the main route of the aqueduct, 29 tunnels with a total length of 92 miles. Nine additional tunnels, with a combined length of 15 miles, are planned for the distributing system. There will be 52 sections of concrete conduits, 98 sections of concrete-lined canal and 146 inverted syphons. By this aqueduct, which has been called the greatest domestic water supply system in the history of engineering, water will be carried from the Colorado river into southern California.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

For Example

The case before the court had been going on for many days, and concerned a claim that involved wearisome technicalities. Things were not improved when a counsel made a speech of unnecessary length. He said:

"Then, my lord, comes the question of bags; they might have been full bags or half-full bags; or, again, my lord, they might have been empty bags."

"Or," interrupted the sorely tried judge, "they might have been wind bags."

"But, I say," expostulated Screeves, "surely a little thing like that could be fixed up—couldn't you lengthen the stage a bit?"

No Moon or Music

By PHILIP L. KETCHUM

© McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service.

HE WAS thirty-five and very successful. Women had not played any part in his life. He hadn't had the time.

She was thirty-one and not at all successful in terms of money. But she was rather well satisfied with the life that she was living. Her job paid her enough to take a trip each summer and she loved to travel. For ten years men had not played any part in her life. When she was twenty-one she had been madly in love with a man who had been killed and after she had recovered from the shock she discovered that men had become unnecessary to her happiness.

They met in the most casual manner at a mountain inn forty miles from Denver. When introduced, they laughed about their names, Tom Brown and Mary Smith. They decided that people with such common names could never become much of a problem.

The first day they went riding. That night they dined together and afterwards sat on the porch and talked. They discovered many things in common—books, plays, travel and music. They went to their rooms early, saying good-night very properly and planning to climb some mountain the next day.

They started but never reached the top. Each admitted that the horseback ride the day before had been too much and so they turned back and sought a shady, grassy spot. They found one on the bank of a rushing mountain stream and the woman lay down at the foot of a tree. The man sprawled out beside her. They didn't talk much.

The man thought: "I've never felt so absolutely at peace in my life. I've never before been so near to pure happiness. I don't think that I'm even interested in what's happening at the office. I just wish that I could feel like this forever. I wonder why it is?" And then he looked over at the woman and frowned.

The woman thought: "What has happened to me? I feel positively miserable. I didn't sleep well last night and I've lost all zest for the rest of my trip. I'm not interested in going on to Yellowstone, though I've thought about it for a year." She saw the man frowning at her and looked away.

They went back to the inn early and had rather an uncomfortable dinner together. They didn't sit out on the porch that night. The woman said that she had a headache and the man said that he had to write some letters. He went to his room and tried to write but after a while gave it up and went outside. He smoked his pipe and wondered what the woman was doing. He said to himself: "Tom Brown, you have no business going crazy about some woman. You have a lot of work ahead. Act your age." Then he spent an hour thinking of some of the things the woman had said, of the way she walked, of the way her hair was combed and of the way she twisted her lips when she was amused.

After breakfast the next morning he said to her: "Let's take a walk. I want to talk to you."

She looked a little startled and hesitated but he took her arm and led her to a little clearing among the pines.

Stopping there the man said rather gruffly: "Look here, Mary Smith. I'm a grain broker and it's a tough game but I'm getting ahead. I have no time for a woman."

Mary Smith nodded her head. She gripped her hands tight. "I understand," she said. "I feel the same way. I'm perfectly happy with my job. There isn't any place in my life for a man."

The man said: "We've got to be sensible about this. We're both old enough not to be swept away by any sentimental emotion. It's nine o'clock in the morning, a sensible hour. There isn't any moon or music."

"No, no moon or music," Mary Smith repeated.

For another moment they stood facing each other, then moved forward. The man's arms went around the woman, hungrily. He held her close to his breast and his lips found hers. But he was not holding her any tighter than she was holding him.

They spent two weeks together. They rode horseback, climbed mountains, danced, talked and sat silent for hours. They told each other foolish, ridiculous experiences from their past lives about which each was so jealous. They were frankly, openly, in love, but they didn't talk about when they would get married. They were determined to be sensible.

Suddenly, at the end of the two weeks, Mary Smith said that she must return to New York. She told the man only half an hour before making her train. He begged her to change her mind, to wait at least another day, but she said: "No, Tom. It's better this way. This has been a perfect experience. I'll never forget it."

White of lip, the man said: "I'll see you some day in New York."

She nodded. "Of course."

After she had gone the man sat on the porch for a long time, thinking. Then a sudden realization banished all doubts and fears. Half aloud, he said: "From the very beginning we talked of nothing but the past. We knew that we would have to face the future together. But like two fool kids we parted without even exchanging addresses.

He rushed inside to pack. If he took an airplane he could catch Mary at Omaha.

BEDTIME STORY FOR CHILDREN

By THORNTON W. BURGESS

LIGHTFOOT IS RECKLESS

IN HIS search for the new stranger who had come to the Green Forest, Lightfoot the Deer was wholly reckless. He no longer stole like a gray shadow from thicket to thicket as he had done when searching for Miss Daintyfoot. He bounded along, careless of how much noise he made. From time to time he would stop to whistle a challenge and to clash his horns against the trees and stamp the ground with his feet.

"There Is Going to Be Some Great Excitement Here When Lightfoot Discovers This Fellow," Thought Sammy.

After such exhibitions of anger he would pause to listen, hoping to hear some sound which would tell him where the stranger was. Now and then he found the stranger's tracks, and from them he knew that this stranger was doing just what he had been doing, seeking to find the beautiful Miss Daintyfoot. Each time he found these signs, Lightfoot's rage increased.

Of course it didn't take Sammy Jay long to discover what was going on. There is little that escapes those sharp eyes of Sammy Jay. As you know, he had early discovered the game of hide and seek Lightfoot had been playing with the beautiful young visitor who had come down to the Green Forest from the Great Mountain. Then, by chance, Sammy had visited the Laughing Brook just as the big stranger had come down there to drink. For once, Sammy had kept his tongue still. "There is going to be excitement here when Lightfoot discovers this fellow," thought Sammy. "If they ever meet, and I have a feeling that they will, there is going to be a fight worth seeing. I must pass the word around."

So Sammy Jay hunted up his cousin, Blacky the Crow, and told him what he had discovered. Then he hunted up Bobby Coon and told him. He saw Unc' Billy Possum sitting in the doorway of his hollow tree and told him. He discovered Jumper the Hare sitting under a little hemlock tree and told him. Then he flew over to the dear old Brier Patch to tell Peter Rabbit. Of course he told Drummer the Woodpecker, Tommy Tit the Chickadee, and Yank Yank the Nuthatch, who were over in the Old Orchard, and they at once hurried to the Green Forest, for they couldn't think of missing anything so exciting as would be the meeting between Lightfoot and the big stranger from the Great Mountain.

Sammy didn't forget to tell Paddy the Beaver, but it was now news to Paddy. Paddy had seen the big stranger on the edge of his pond early the night before.

Of course Lightfoot knew nothing about all this. His one thought was to find the big stranger and drive him from the Green Forest, and so he continued his search tirelessly.

MOTHER'S COOK BOOK

DESSERTS NEW AND OLD

SUNDAY desserts are the kind that can be made the day before and give mother a real day of rest. The following are some which will be enjoyed by the whole family:

Peanut Brittle Parfait.

Take one-third of a cupful of brown sugar, one tablespoonful of butter and blend well in a saucepan. When smooth add one-fourth of a cupful of water and cook, stirring constantly. This makes a sirup. Beat the yolks of two eggs until light in the top of a double boiler, then add the sirup gradually and beat until light and fluffy. Set aside to cool. Beat one cupful of heavy cream until stiff, add a pinch of salt and a scant cupful of ground peanut brittle. Mix well and pack in ice and salt or freeze in a mechanical refrigerator.

Chocolate Blanc Mange.

Soak three tablespoonfuls of gelatin in one-half cupful of cold water for ten minutes. Add one-half cupful of sugar to a melted chocolate candy bar; add one cupful of scalded milk. Cook until smooth, then add three more cupfuls of milk, the soaked gelatin and a teaspoonful of vanilla. Stir until well mixed, remove from the fire and pour into a mold to chill.

Porto Rican Baked Bananas.

Select underripe bananas; put them without removing the skins into a very hot oven to bake until the skins burst. Serve in a folded napkin—do not remove the skins until the moment of eating. Serve with plenty of butter.

Alabama French Dressing.

To the french dressing add two tablespoonfuls of ketchup, four drops of tabasco sauce, two tablespoonfuls of chopped olives and mix well. Serve on any green or vegetable salad.

Banana Ice Cream.

Scald one quart of thin cream, add one and one-half cupfuls of sugar. When cold add a pint of chilled cream and freeze. When the cream is partly frozen add one and one-half cupfuls of banana pulp put through a ricer with the juice of one and one-half lemons. Finish freezing and let stand well packed to ripen for several hours.

COIN, HAT AND GLASS

A DERBY hat is resting upon a large glass. The presence of the hat makes it impossible for any object to enter the glass.

Taking several pennies, the magician shows them in his right hand, while he steadies the hat with his left. He flings the coins into the hat. One coin travels straight through the crown and arrives, with a clink, in the tumbler.

Hat, coins and glass may be examined. How, then, was the trick accomplished? Very simple—so simple, in fact, that you can learn it with but little practice.

Wedge a coin between the hat and the glass rim, where it stays hidden, before the trick. As your right hand flings the coin, your left—steadying the hat—raises just a trifle and the hidden coin clinks into the tumbler.

MORE TO DO

By DOUGLAS MALLOCH

SAY not tonight that you are through;
There will be something more to do
Tomorrow morning. Only they
Are ever through to whom the day
Suggests no deed that may be done
Tomorrow with the rising sun.

For those who do the things worth while
Are not the ones who end a mile
And see no new mile on ahead:
There is a valley yet to tread
Beyond the crest of ev'ry hill
To those who follow heaven's will.

We're never through while there's a thing
To do, while there's a song to sing,
A pray'r to utter, or a friend
To hearten even at the end,
Yes, even deeds God understands
The old can do with folded hands.

For, be they little, be they great,
Each morning our new tasks await,
A word to say, a smile to give
That makes life easier to live.
How young or old, or I or you,
There will be something more to do.

FAVOR LIP-READING OVER FINGER TALK

Hard of Hearing Find Method More Efficient.

Denver.—The sign language and symmetry of its movements when spoken by an expert, is rapidly giving way to the more efficient method of communication by lip reading.

Rev. Eugene J. Gehl of Kenosha, Wis., who speaks in both silent mediums as well as through the spoken word, explained the advantage of lip reading while in Denver recently conducting a mission.

Father Gehl is a missionary for St. John's Institute for the Deaf in St. Francis, Wis., who has become a master orator in sign language, voice and lips during 25 years of work among the deaf.

Beautiful Gestures.

"The sign language of deaf mutes is no longer so important as it once was," he said, "but it is beautiful. Those experienced with its symbolism and mechanics can produce every oratorical effect the voice can achieve.

"Deaf persons will not 'listen' to a speech by a man whose gestures are clumsy and jerky. Through many years the sign language has reached a high point of systematized development, although it is being replaced by the more scientific lip reading."

Words Seldom Spelled.

More than 1,400 accredited symbols for words and ideas, in addition to a complete alphabet, make up the sign language, he revealed.

"But the expert seldom has to spell out his words," he remarked.

"The test of eloquence in the sign language is the speaker's ability to make smooth transitions between his gestures and group symbols into the units required by the thought. A change of pace in the manipulation of the hands is every bit as effective as a change of pace in speaking.

"The space through which the gesture moves corresponds to voice volume. Where the ordinary speaker would shout, the sign orator moves his hands and arms in a wider sphere."

Climate Is Blamed for Peculiarities of Accent

Boston.—Another champion of the Yankee twang, the Southern accent and the Western drawl has launched a broadside against those who would standardize English enunciation.

Prof. William G. Hoffman of Boston university's college of business administration, declares that speech unification is a defi to the elements, for climate has much to do with controlling dialects.

The cold, raw climate of New England, said Professor Hoffman, is the basis of the twangy dialect of the rural sections. The warm, balmy South has given a characteristic warm fluency to the speech in that part of the country. And the dryness of the West plays its part in affecting the speech of the cow-puncher.

But the sparkle of the various intonations, although it still exists, is being slowly dulled, said Professor Hoffman.

He agreed with the findings of Dr. Hans Kurath, Brown university, whose extensive study revealed that formal education, newspaper, radio and the theater have brought about a progressive modification of American speech.

Figures on Fires Form Hobby of Antique Dealer

Des Moines, Iowa.—The clang of the fire bell means another entry in his notebook to Earle L. Robinson, fifty-four years old, an antique dealer, whose hobby is compiling and interpreting statistics of fire losses.

The diminutive storekeeper is so intensely interested in his long columns of figures that what to others may seem a dull job is to Robinson an exciting pastime.

His favorite company is Des Moines' No. 11, and he appears before the city council to urge new equipment, armed with tables and statistics. Besides his continual amassing of figures, his hobby has designated him as a sort of traffic policeman in his district when the fire alarm sounds.

Robinson binds his charts into book form. They include the number of alarms, where they are given, the size of water mains in the district, the fire hazards, and the number of hospitals and schools in the neighborhood.

He has never been a member of a fire department. "I've never had a fire and I've never been burnt," he says.

Student 'Grubstake' Doubles in 28 Years

Berkeley, Calif.—A "grubstake" loan fund of $349 donated to the University of California in 1908 has now grown to $612.91. The original loan was brought to President Benjamin Ide Wheeler in 1908 by a messenger from some unidentified person who wanted it to be used to "grubstake" some student through college.

The original amount was $350, but President Wheeler gave the messenger $1. The remaining $349 was kept invested when it wasn't "grubstaking" some student, until it has reached its present proportions.

Farmful of Snakes

Bennington, Mich.—St. Patrick would have found a much more fertile field here in pioneer days for his labors against snakes than in Ireland, according to a record left by S. B. Bugbee. He reported that upon purchase of his farm in 1837 he took a short stroll and killed 40 snakes, many of them rattlers.

Lights of New York

by L. L. STEVENSON

Continually, the new New York swallows up the old. Now the Murray Hill hotel, just about the last inn that remains a link with the past, is to be modernized. For years, it has been a Park avenue fastness of old days and old traditions despite the ever-changing pattern of the city. With its ornamental furniture, mirrors, gilt, high-ceilinged rooms and red brick, towered exterior, it was once the wonder of the hotel world. Built in 1884, one year after the Metropolitan opera house, at a cost of $1,000,000, it was the gathering place of youth, beauty, fashion and distinction of the time. In the days of its glory, the hansom cab trade from its doors ran as high as $700 a week. Included among its residents were Mark Twain, J. P. Morgan, Sr., Richard Croker, the former Tammany leader, and P. T. Barnum. The late President William McKinley had a suite there, whenever he was in New York. The Philadelphia Biddles and Drexels made annual Christmas week reservations there.

* * *

In comparison with present day prices, despite its reputation, rates in the old days at the Murray Hill were modest. Four meals and a room cost $4. They were real meals, too. An old menu lists 73 dishes from which to choose. In season, American plan guests were served with shad roe for supper every night. The inaugural dinner of former President Grover Cleveland was cooked by the hotel's chef and sent to Washington by special train. Many of the prominent guests kept private stocks of wine there. The original bar, at which cocktails were sold at two for a quarter until the World war, is still in use.

* * *

The hotel was purchased by Benjamin L. M. Bates in 1910 and for years he ran it as a sentimental venture without regard to profits. The red brick exterior was cleaned entirely by hand in 1925 and a new kitchen installed at a cost of $175,000. Mr. Bates died in December and now with the settlement of his estate, the old hotel is to change from the days of leisure to those of hustle and bustle.

Seldom indeed does beauty thwart ambition, especially in the case of a young girl. Yet there is Miss Imogene Carpenter. Her great ambition was to become a concert pianist, so she perfected herself in the works of the masters and then tried for engagements. Agents merely laughed at her—she was too pretty for concert work. So she turned from Beethoven and Liszt to hot numbers and swing music and is now pianist in the Rainbow Grill. But she is longing to get back to Bach.

This and that department: Earl Thomas, a bit of a statistician, has figured it out that the average New Yorker is five feet, seven inches in height, wears a size eight and a half shoe, prefers roast beef and hashed brown potatoes and says "Yes, dear," to his wife six times a day. . . . Alderman Peter H. Ruvolo, of Brooklyn, is reported to want to change the names of certain streets to such glistening titles as Emerald, Amber, Sapphire and Ruby. . . . Ray Perkins reports that in an antique shop on Sixth avenue, a crystal radio set with earphones is offered for sale—an indication that radio has finally come of age.

Gilbert Miller has one of those memories that retain certain things indefinitely and allow others to leak out quickly. Names are his bane. So one time while he was in London and his wife in Paris, he called her by long distance phone to obtain the name of his secretary who was in New York and whom he desired to cable.

Plays in Church Called "Better Than Sermons"

Melbourne, Australia.—A church in Melbourne is to be used as a regular "theater" for religious plays if plans made by its vicar succeed. He is Father F. E. Maynard, vicar of St. Peter's church.

"People may get a greater message from seeing an appropriate religious play than from hearing many sermons," he announced. "Drama," he added, "can be used for the teaching of the Christian message far more effectively than at present."

Splinter in Throat Years; Coughed Up

Ashtabula, Ohio.—Some years ago when Ross Burlingame, of Ashtabula, was a small boy, he fell while running, and the stick he was carrying in his hand was jammed into his mouth, injuring his throat. Seized with a coughing spell recently, he coughed out a splinter the size of a toothpick, which had been lodged in his throat and never removed.

Hitler Talks With His War Lords

Chancellor Adolf Hitler (right) snapped in informal conversation with the heads of the Reich army. At the left is Lieut. Gen. Werner Von Blomberg, the minister of war. Next to him is Gen. Frieherr Von Fritsch, chief of staff. With his back to the camera is General Lietman. These men are believed the motivating forces behind Germany's occupation of the Rhine in violation of the Locarno treaty.

Some Places in World Where It's Really Cold

For Instance, Regard Northeastern Siberia.

Washington. — Many a shivering American, watching his thermometer hover far below normal this winter, has thought that his frosty bedroom must be about the coldest spot on earth, or has thanked his lucky stars that he wasn't in the Antarctic with Lincoln Ellsworth.

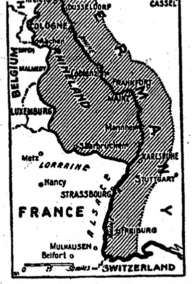
Actually, however, many Americans might have found it considerably warmer in the Antarctic (where it was summer) than at home this winter. Ellsworth reported a temperature of only five below zero Fahrenheit one day during his flight across the South Polar continent, while in the United States some places have had temperatures down to 50 below zero.

"Even 50 below, however, is warm compared to some cold weather that has been recorded in the really frigid parts of the earth," says the National Geographic society.

Only 90 Below Zero.

"Though the winter of 1935-36 will go down in history as one of America's coldest ones, it cannot compare with the winters that visit a region of northeastern Siberia, generally recognized as the 'cold pole' of the earth.

HITLER'S COUP



The shaded area in this map represents the demilitarized strip along the Rhine which Adolf Hitler ordered the German army to occupy in violation of the Locarno pact and the Versailles treaty.

"There, at the town of Verkhoyansk, thermometers have dropped to 90 degrees below zero Fahrenheit. Devils Lake, N. D., had an average temperature of 20 degrees below zero for five weeks this winter, but Verkhoyansk has averaged as much as 58 below for the month of January in past years.

"On really cold days in Verkhoyansk, the exhaled vapor of a man's breath crystallizes into cracking needles of ice, and breathing becomes painful. Ice forms in the nostrils of horses and threatens to suffocate them.

"But though Lincoln Ellsworth found it as warm as five below zero during the last Antarctic summer, the winter in the South Polar regions is a different story. Admiral Byrd, on his lone vigil at the advanced weather observation base, during the Antarctic winter, recorded a minimum temperature of 80 below.

North and South Poles.

"Summer temperatures both at the North and South poles are much warmer than the colder days experienced in some parts of the United States this winter. When Roald Amundsen discovered the South pole in December, 1911, he reported that it was only 2.2 degrees below zero Fahrenheit. Peary at the North pole, in April, 1909, found the temperature ranging from 11 to 30 below. Doubtless both poles are far colder in winter, but no one has visited them at that time of year.

"Any polar explorer, however, would have found it cold enough to suit him at Riverside ranger station in Yellowstone park, on February 9, 1933. On that date the official thermometer there dropped to 66 below zero Fahrenheit, the record low temperature for the United States.

"When it comes to producing real cold, mother nature is a 'piker' when compared to modern scientists. Recently, at the University of Leyden, the Netherlands, experimenters have come within a fraction of a degree of attaining 'absolute zero,' the 'coldest cold' which is set theoretically at 459.6 degrees below zero Fahrenheit.

"This extreme cold is achieved by cooling a substance with the aid of liquid air, liquid hydrogen and liquid helium. Then the substance is magnetized, which heats it, and liquid helium is used to remove this heat. The substance then is demagnetized, and as a result it becomes colder still. By subjecting substances to such great cold, scientists hope to learn more about the properties and structure of matter.

"But if all this talk of great cold chills you, end the story with a few thoughts about Death Valley, California, where at times it grows so hot that thermometers have registered over 134 degrees above zero!"

Tree Produces Fruit Blend of Orange-Lemon

San Diego, Calif.—Instead of mixing orange and lemon juice for drinks in the future, it may be possible to squeeze an orange-lemon blend out of a single fruit if trees perfected by a Chula Vista rancher are adopted commercially.

James M. Ater, nicknamed the "Chula Vista Burbank" for his numerous experiments in plant breeding, has perfected what he calls a "lemor," which he says combines the flavor of the orange and the lemon into a delicious blend.

Ater has gone to the unusual length of patenting his new fruit, and is now considering crossing it with the lime to produce a still more complex product.

Explaining his method, Ater said he obtained wild orange trees and budded them with lemons.

Taking a cue from certain industrial machinery manufacturers, Ater plans to lease his trees rather than sell them if they prove feasible commercially and collect a royalty as well.

The new fruit is superior to either the orange or the lemon in keeping properties, Ater said, and will remain in good condition 18 months after being picked.

$621,867 Being Held in Conscience Fund of U. S.

Washington.—Persons who wanted to have an easy mind paid $5,885.69 to the United States treasury last year.

By so doing they took a load off their respective chests and raised the value of the national "conscience fund" to $621,867.65. These contributors never give their names.

The "conscience fund," more prosaically known as document 126,420, was started in 1811 when an unknown individual sent $5 to the treasury of President Madison because he felt he had "defrauded the government."

Before the year was over enough money had been contributed by guilty minded persons to bolster the fund to $250 and it was launched into perpetuity.

Although there were no more contributions until 1827, every year since then, with the single exception of 1848, bad consciences have increased treasury totals.

The money is set aside as "anonymous contributions" and included in the nation's general fund.

The worst conscience the nation ever had, judging by the year's total must have been 1916 when $54,923.15 was sent in.

Contributions usually are impelled by sudden pangs of conscience and are customarily sent by persons who have used postage stamps a second time, failed to pay duties on articles, evaded income taxes, or stolen government property.

Traffic Perils Grouped Under Three Age Periods

London.—There are three five-year periods in a person's life when the risk of death is greatest, according to a statistical review by the registrar general of the 40,350,000 people of England and Wales.

These "three ages of peril" as set forth in the survey are:

Between five and ten, when children become pedestrians, but have no experience as to safety.

Between twenty and twenty-five, when young people get behind the wheel of an automobile and drive at top speed "without being restrained by a sense of responsibility."

Between seventy and seventy-five, when old people are physically unable to escape traffic dangers.

Curiously, the risk of death for women from motor accidents remained unchanged over a three-year period despite a large increase in the number of woman motorists on the highways. At the same time the risk of death for boys between ten and fifteen fell from 132 to 106 per million of population. This was counterbalanced by the risk of young men between twenty and twenty-five increasing from 365 to 393 per million.

Norristown, Pa.—Something of a record for keeping its financial house in order is claimed by Plymouth township, located between this city and Conshohocken. For 22 continuous years it has been free of debt and indications are that its 1936 budget of $26,896 will be met without strain.

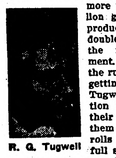
Half Million Farmers May Get Double Federal Benefits—New Processing Taxes Abandoned—Clements Quits as Townsend Plan Secretary.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

REXFORD G. TUGWELL, head of the rural resettlement administration, announced that a special committee is considering a plan under which more than half a million growers of farm products would receive double benefits from the federal government. It provides that the rural families now getting loans from Tugwell's administration to put them on their feet and keep them off the relief rolls may also receive full subsidy payments in connection with the soil conservation program now being put into operation. There are now 450,000 recipients of the Tugwell loans and the number is expected to increase to 525,000 by July 1.



R. G. Tugwell

The soil conservation subsidies are to be paid to farmers who transfer land from commercial crop production to soil conserving growths, or who resort to other "economic" farm practices. Officials said that the rehabilitation clients already are under obligation to treat their soil wisely. Before a family can obtain a rehabilitation loan it must agree to follow a farm management plan drafted by the government.

This plan stipulates that the borrower must conserve his land's fertility and grow food and feed crops for home consumption. It also includes a financial budget.

ONE of the major features of the new tax program suggested by President Roosevelt is omitted from the measure prepared by a house subcommittee and on which open hearings were begun by the ways and means committee. For political reasons it was decided that the plan for new processing taxes on farm and competing products should be abandoned. Mr. Roosevelt's suggestion for a "windfall" tax to recapture part of the refunded or unpaid AAA processing levies was accepted by the subcommittee.

A third suggestion of the President, for graduated taxes on the portions of incomes which corporations do not distribute in dividends to stockholders, was changed to provide levies on total income of corporations varied according to percentages of profits put into reserves.

The subcommittee agreed that the corporation tax rates should be so drafted as to permit corporations, particularly small ones, to build up reserves for lean years without being compelled to pay comparatively high taxes for the privilege of doing so.

The subcommittee figured on collecting some $25,000,000 from taxes on dividends going to foreigners who own stock in American corporations and $83,000,000 from temporary continuation of the capital stock and excess profits taxes.

JUST as Chairman C. Jasper Bell and his house committee were about to open their inquiry into the finances of the Townsend old age pension plan organization, Robert E. Clements, co-founder, secretary and director of the movement, resigned. He was summoned to be the first witness before the committee but said his resignation was not motivated by this, but was solely due to his opposition to political activities of other leaders of the organization. Dr. F. E. Townsend in Los Angeles expressed his "hearty approval" of Clements' action, and it was predicted other officials of the movement would follow the secretary's example.

R. E. Clements

Clements appeared before the committee with a great mass of records, ready to "account for every penny collected." Before testifying he said: "I have nothing to hide. I'm anxious to appear. I have been responsible for financing the Townsend plan. I have collected around $850,000 and the organizaton has spent about $750,000. There is still $100,000 on hand."

SEVERAL witnesses who appeared before a senate subcommittee declared that the Robinson-Patman anti-chain store bill, which has administration backing, would promote rather than curb monopolies, increase the cost and lower the standard of living, and decrease employment in whole industries.

The hearing was on the Borah-Van Nuys bill, a modification of the Robinson-Patman measure, but the witnesses particularly attacked the latter, which already has been reported favorably. The house judiciary committee reported the Utterback bill, still another modification of the Robinson-Patman measure, and a bitter fight over the proposed legislation is expected.

The Robinson-Patman bill would prohibit manufacturers from making price discriminations in favor of large quantity purchasers, through advertising allowances, service charges, brokerage fees, etc. The Borah-Nuys bill would prohibit such allowances only when they were refused to purchasers of goods of "like grade, quality, and quantity."

ONE of the big fights within the American Federation of Labor has been settled peacefully. It was for control of the building trades department. In the past, building projects have been held up by strikes growing out of arguments over which of two unions should do a certain piece of work. The peace pact provides for appointment of an impartial referee to settle such arguments.

The pact also called for J. W. Williams of the carpenters to head the reorganization department, with M. J. McDonough of the plasterers as secretary-treasurer. Each has been the leader of one of the warring factions and each has styled himself as the lawful department president.

BENITO MUSSOLINI evidently expects another European war, and in preparation for it he announced several drastic measures on the seventeenth anniversary of the founding of the Fascist party. He abolished the chamber of deputies, substituting for it a council of guilds; and he also eliminated the country's large industries, leaving the medium and small private industries in existence. This latter move, he told the council of the 22 guilds of the corporative state, was to increase the nation's economic self-sufficiency. "When and how war will come, one does not know," he said, "but the wheel of fate turns fast."

Benito Mussolini

Mussolini asserted the large industries, particularly those working for the defense of the nation, would be formed into organizations called "key industries." These, he said, "will be run directly or indirectly by the government. Some will have mixed organization."

HAVING sent Joachim von Ribbentrop back to London with a modified rejection of the four power plans for peace in western Europe, Hitler was preparing his counter proposals which British Foreign Minister Eden had requested. Meanwhile the reichsfuehrer continued his campaign tour, delivering rousing speeches in defense of his policies. Speaking in Ludwigshafen, in the heart of the remilitarized Rhineland, he said: "Those who want us to grovel on our knees before agreeing to talk with us forget we are not a tribe of savages, but a European nation looking back on thousands of years of culture.

"I stretch out my hand to France. We want peace for common sense reasons. Germany needs no more fame on the battlefield, but is now getting ready to seek laurels in the Olympic peace competition of nations. Men who relish the indecent thought of victor and vanquished are not statesmen. They must be silent when peace talks start."

Most of the continental statesmen who gathered in London to consider the Rhineland affair went home, some of them in very bad humor over the indecisive proceedings. The French, disinclined to consider any further proposals from Hitler, were urging that the French, British and Belgian general staffs get together on plans in accordance with the Locarno treaty.

IN CONNECTION with the signing of the new naval treaty by the United States, Great Britain and France, it was disclosed in London that the two first named powers have reaffirmed the 50-50 ratio for their fleets and again promised not to compete against each other in naval building. The new three power pact limits the size of battleships to 35,000 tons, retains 10,000 tons as the maximum for cruisers and provides no cruisers of that size shall be built for six years.

In the expiring Washington treaty there was an article regarding fortification of naval bases. This is not renewed in the new pact, and Japan requested information as to the future intentions of the powers. Consequently the United States, Great Britain and Japan were carrying on diplomatic conversations on that topic.

The new treaty gives the signatories certain liberty of action in the event of unforeseen naval activity by powers not signatory to the treaty. So far as America is concerned, this "escape clause" is taken to apply mainly to Japan.

FOURTEEN persons perished in Mexico's worst aviation disaster. A big trimotored plane carrying ten European tourists and four company employees crashed on the ridge between the volcanoes Popocatapetl and Ixtaccihuatl and there were no survivors to explain why it fell. Among the tourists were Prince Adolf of Schaumburg-Lippe and his wife, Princess Elisbeth.

KOKI HIROTA, the new liberal premier of Japan, declared in an interview: "While I am premier there will be no war"; and continued: "We intend to cultivate our traditional friendship with Great Britain, the United States, Russia, and other powers, thus fulfilling our great mission of stabilizing east Asia."

On the same day that Hirota made this pronouncement the soviet Russian government ordered its ambassador to Japan to lodge a strong protest following a new border engagement which Soviet advices said resulted from a Japanese attack on a Red frontier post. Fighting lasted for hours, entailing loss of life on both sides, said the reports.

FEDERAL reserve board has prescribed a 55 per cent minimum margin for purchases of stocks, the ruling becoming effective April 1 for stocks bought through brokers and May 1 for those bought through banks.

The margin regulations were made to apply only to listed securities on registered stock exchanges, thus having no effect upon the large over-the-counter market.

The maximum loan value applying to registered stocks has been fixed at 45 per cent of current market value.

WITH only one change, the house passed the senate bill to continue the Electric Home and Farm authority as a federal agency until February 1, 1937, or any earlier date decreed by the President. The authority was created to help finance sales of electrical appliances.

HENRY BOYLE SOMERVILLE, aged and retired vice admiral of the British navy, was murdered by gunmen at his residence at Castletownsend, County Cork, Irish Free State. Thrown through the door of the house was a card bearing these words: "This British agent sent 52 Irish boys into the British army in the last few months. He will send no more."

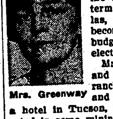
The admiral had received previous threats because of his recruiting activities.

INTREPID citizens of scores of cities and towns in the eastern and New England states which were devastated by the unprecedented floods were digging out their homes and places of business from the mud and debris as the turbulent waters of many rivers subsided. Reconstruction and refitting began everywhere immediately, and this, as well as the relief of the suffering thousands, was aided by funds totaling more than $48,000,000 allocated by President Roosevelt before he left Washington for Florida.

Rough estimates were that the total dead in 13 states were 169; the homeless were 221,500, and the total property damage, $271,500,000. The last figure probably would be tripled if one took into account the losses from interruption to industry and trade and the stoppage of the wages of labor.

Cities along the lower Ohio were threatened as the flood waters raced down to the Mississippi and the Gulf of Mexico, but they had had plenty of warning and were in a measure prepared.

ISABELLA GREENWAY, the capable lady who has represented Arizona in congress since October, 1933, has announced in Tucson that she will retire from public life at the conclusion of her present term. She was first elected for the remainder of the term of Lewis Douglas, who resigned to become director of the budget, and was re-elected in 1934.



Mrs. Greenway

Mrs. Greenway owns and operates several ranches in Arizona and New Mexico and a hotel in Tucson, and is also interested in some mining companies. Undoubtedly she could go back to congress without opposition, but she says she wants to devote more time to her private activities.

STILL refusing to appropriate $12,000,000 for the Florida ship canal, the senate passed the army bill carrying approximately $611,000,000. More than half the sum goes for the military activities of the War department.

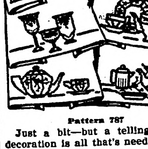
There will be no reduction in the number of CCC camps during most of the coming fiscal year, and the enrollees will be kept up to about the 350,000 mark. This was the decision of President Roosevelt after a threatened revolt of Democratic representatives induced him to change his mind in the matter.

Senator Black, chairman of the senate lobbying committee, has added the Wichita Beacon to the papers whose telegrams he has seized or attempted to seize.

SENATOR WILLIAM E. BORAH is campaigning earnestly for the Republican Presidential nomination, and has just received a big boost for his cause in the announcement that Dr. Francis E. Townsend, founder of the old age pension plan that bears his name, will give the Idahoan all his support. Repudiating President Roosevelt and changing his registration at Long Beach, Calif., from Democratic to Republican, Townsend said Borah was the only Republican candidate who "even approached" the standard of the Townsendites, although the senator has refused to indorse the Townsend pension plan as it stands.

Hitherto the Townsend organization had favored circulation of third party petitions in every state to enlist millions of people as a demonstration of strength. So the doctor's announcement is a reversal of policy

Cross Stitch Towels That Are Fun to Make



Pattern 787

Just a bit—but a telling bit—of decoration is all that's needed today to make our household linens smart. And so, simple cross stitch brings color and life to humble tea-towels which make dish doing a pleasure rather than a duty. These motifs of glassware and china—in cross stitch—are easy to embroider. This half dozen makes fine pick-up work, and also a grand prize for a bridge party—or most acceptable for a fair donation.

Pattern 787 comes to you with a transfer pattern of six motifs averaging 4½ by 9½ inches; details of all stitches used; and material requirements.

Only Malady Prevalent in Virgin Isles Is Indolence

Temperature in the Virgin Islands ranges in the winter from 70 to 80, and in the summer it jumps about five degrees. The islands are swept by trade winds that blow almost constantly.

Hardly anybody is sick in Saint Thomas. Nobody has colds or bronchitis or pneumonia. Tropical diseases are almost unknown. Yellow fever does not exist, and malaria doesn't count. The only malady contracted by visitors is indolence, and the sooner you get it the happier you will be, for it's lovely being lazy in the Virgins.—Eleanor Early in Cosmopolitan.

HORNED RABBIT IN TEXAS

Texas, long noted for its cattle, can now boast of rabbits with horns. A rabbit with two horns protruding from the base of the ears was exhibited at Texarkana, Texas, by Mrs. Max E. Bertch. It was killed on a farm near Old Boston, Texas.

Star Gives Pleasure by Simply Being What It Is

A star is beautiful; it affords pleasure, not from what it is to do, or to give, but simply by being what it is. It befits the heavens; it has congruity with the mighty space in which it dwells. It has repose; no force disturbs its eternal peace. It has freedom; no obstruction lies between it and infinity.—Carlyle.

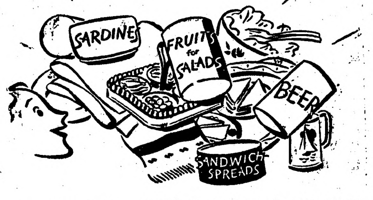
The NEWEST PARTIES



THE newest parties—and those that are best fun—are the impromptu parties. This doesn't mean, however, that your guests must always flock in with a "Surprise! Surprise!" and find you in ecstasies over it all.

It means, merely, that you are so well prepared for entertaining that you are comfortably equipped to give spur-of-the-moment parties and know that cook's in the kitchen, all's well with the cupboard. Once upon a time this would have been interpreted to mean that your linen closet was piled high with correct napery, your silver chest was replete, and that the pantry was stocked like a corner delicatessen.

Times Have Changed

Not today. All you need is some bright peasant linens, some wooden bowls for salads, or sandwich trays for sandwiches, and some steins for beer or cider—depending on whether your spur-of-the-moment parties are younger-set or adult.

As for the pantry—keep on hand canned sandwich spreads, canned fruits or fish for salads, an extra loaf of bread or so, which can be toasted if it becomes stale, some delicious salad dressings, olives and pickles, vacuum-packed coffee and perhaps some mints.

Keep the refrigerator well stocked with canned beer. The newest way to buy beer for home use or for parties is in cans. You'll be delighted to find that two cans of this beer take up only the space required for one bottle of beer—and thus your party shelf in the refrigerator doesn't crowd out the children's Grade A milk and such.

No doubt, by this time, you know all sorts of good things to serve with beer, but since we're always scouting around for something new for these "newest" parties—here are more suggestions:

Snappy Come-Backs

Toasted Deviled Cheese Sandwiches: Spread squares or oblongs of buttered toast with deviled ham. Sprinkle thickly with grated cheese and place under the broiler flame until the cheese is melted and browned. Serve at once.

Corned Beef and Celery Sandwiches: Chop sufficient canned corned beef to fill one cup. Add one-half cup finely-chopped celery and one-third cup chili sauce. Spread between slices of buttered whole wheat bread. This makes about one dozen whole-slice sandwiches.

Vienna Sandwiches: Cut sausages from one can of Vienna sausages in thin rings and put a layer of them on bread that has been spread with butter and mayonnaise. Sprinkle with a little chopped sweet pickle and cover with another slice of bread spread with butter and mayonnaise.

Sardine and Pimiento Sandwiches: Bone, skin and mash the contents of one can of sardines (or use the boneless and skinless sardines). Add two tablespoons chopped pimiento and four tablespoons mayonnaise. Spread between buttered rye bread slices.

Sauerkraut, Sausages and Blushing Apples: Heat the sauerkraut from one 1-pound can of sauerkraut and pile in the center of a large hot platter. Heat the contents of one 9-ounce can of Vienna sausages and arrange on top. Around the edges place six small apples which have been cored, pared and cooked in a syrup made by boiling one cup sugar, one and one-half cups water and a few red cinnamon candies together. Turn the apples around often so they cook and color evenly on all sides. Let cook until tender, but not so long that they lose their shape. This serves six persons.

94 Old Age Pensions Approved

Reconsidering all previous applications that had been approved the Marshall county board of commissioners in session in Warren last week approved 94 applications for Old Age assistance with a total of $2,006.20 allotted, or an average of $21.34 for each applicant monthly, according to Paul Steen, county investigator.

With the federal government approval of the Minnesota old age assistance plan, the board followed requirements of the state administrator which made necessary the revision of the original allowance made about a month ago.

The 94 applicants who had gained approval of their applications receieved their first old age pension checks for the month of March this week. Levi G. Johnson, county auditor, who will distribute the warrants under the program announced that it is planned to make out the warrants in the future at the end of each current month.

Hearings were continued by the board on several additional applications, expecting to approve approximately 125 in all. There are 460 applications on file in the county office.

The old age assistance applicants are being investigated on a budgetary basis which include the following items: rent, water, electricity, food, fuel, clothing, incidentals, board and care for those not having own living quarters which are allowed as needed. From this budget the net income of the applicant is deducted to make the allowance.

The state administration board has advised the county to reject any applicant having $300 or more in liquid assets such as savings, bank accounts, cash receivable, etc.

$5 An Acre For Tree Planting

Farmers taking part in the federal soil conservation program may obtain payments of $5 per acre for planting limited acreages of crop or pasture land to trees this season, according to word received by County Agent R. A. Reierson from the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

The message designates tree-planting as one of three soil-improving practices approved by the Secretary of Agriculture for Minnesota. The other two are seeding legumes on crop land, for which $1 to $2 per acre will be paid, and liming crop or pasture land, for which payment will be $2.50 per acre.

The total payment a farmer may obtain for performing one or all of these practices, however, may not be more than $1 per acre for each acre used for the production of soil-building and soil-conserving crops on his farm in 1936. Thus, if he were using 40 acres for the production of alfalfa, clover and long-lived grasses in 1936, he might obtain as mnch as, but no more than $40 for liming, seeding legumes and planting forest trees.

In addition to the "soil-building" payment, as above described, the farmer may earn a "soil conserving" payment, by shifting acerage from "soil-depleting" to "soil-conserving" crops. The rate of "soil-conserving" payment will vary according to the productivity of the soil, but for the United States as a whole will average $10 per acre. The acreage on which it will be paid will be limited.

"The government is offering these payments to encourage farmers to protect their soil from washing or blowing and to increase its fertility," Mr. Reierson says. "Furthermore, the planting of more legumes on most farms will make for a better balanced system of farming. The trees will help to beautify and protect the farmstead and in time will provide fuel, posts and lumber for farm use or market. Everything considered, the program offers the farmer many advantages."

Any farmer wishing more information about the program should visit the "work sheet" center nearest his home this week, or inquire of the county agent or a county or community committeeman.

Conservation Week Announced

In a proclamation issued last week, Governor Olson designated May 3 to 10 inclusive as "Minnesota Conservation Week" and Friday, May 1, as "Arbor and and Bird Day".

The proclamation, in part, follows:

"The return of spring, after one of the coldest winters in Minnesota history, brings new hopes and new courage with which to face the future. The hardships of winter fade into the background and it becomes a little easier to live and work and play. But the spring season should also remind us that the powerful forces of nature have not yet yielded to the intelligence and industry of mankind.

A tremendous amount of planned work remains to be done before it can be said that we in Minnesota have learned to make the most of the many gifts bestowed upon us by nature.

"It is essential to the welfare of the state that the conservation and restoration of our natural resources be given an increasingly prominent place in the education of our citizens, so that they will lend their support to the enlightened program of conservation now being carried on by the federal and state government.

"One week of the year has been set aside for the purpose of bringing the work and the problems of conservation more clearly to the attention of all our people. It is to be hoped that during this week the benefits of forestry, game conservation, water control, and the other activities of conservation will be given publicity.

Appointed 4-H Club Leader

With the appointment of Miss Evelyn Bierbaum, well known Minnesota 4-H club member and leader, as county leader, Marhall county 4-H club work is already beginning and active season, according to R. A. Reierson, county agent.

Miss Beirbaum, a Clearbrook girl, has had several years experience in 4-H club work, both as an active member and county leader, and comes to Marshall county well qualified to direct the activity of the farm boys and girls organization, said Mr. Reierson. She has served as leader in several counties in Northwestern Minnesota, last year being leader in Clay county.

An intensive membership campaign will get under way in the county as soon as road conditions become more favorable and efforts will then be made to organize new clubs in various sections of the county.

Elk Reported Doing Well

Elk imported from Wyoming and released in the northwestern part of the Red Lake Game refuge are reported to be doing well, according to Gustav Swanson, game and fish division biologist.

Elk became extinct in Minnesota about 1900. Several years ago some of the animals were brought here from Wyoming and raised in Itasca State Park. According to Swanson, a similar reintroduction of elk in Michigan about 12 years ago was very successful. There are several hundred elk in Michigan at the present time.

Load Limit On County Roads

Sheriff To Enforce 3 Ton Load Limits In County.

Due to the unusual snow conditions of all roads in Marshall County this spring and fearing that heavy loads will result in the loss of existing gravel the County Board decided to restrict all graveled roads in the county to a three ton load limit, including vehicle.

Sheriff O. C. Toftner will work in conjunction with the county highway department in enforcing this restriction and all violators will be held responsible.

Load limit signs are now being posted by the Highway Department and the roads will be restricted until conditions permit heavier traffic.

Babylonians First to Try "Inflation"

Ancient Tablets Give Line on Business Methods.

Chicago.—Texts from thousands of ancient Assyrian and Babylonian clay tablets, the longest series of business records available, are being pieced together into a remarkable picture of business and banking in the Tigris-Euphrates valley 2,500 years ago by Dr. Waldo H. Dubberstein of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago.

Forerunners of such modern practices as old-age annuities, long and short-term credit, price-fixing attempts, and government hoarding of precious metals, with resulting "inflation," are clearly evident from Doctor Dubberstein's work. He has compiled price-charts for standard commodities, in terms of shekels, for a period of more than 200 years, 625-425 B. C.

"Various kings from the great administrator Hammurabi, about 2000 B. C., to the scholarly Ashurbanipal, 668-626 B. C., attempted to fix prices at low levels," Doctor Dubberstein said. "Their decrees and their lists of prices show them attempting to create prosperity for the people and a feeling of good will by announcing low official prices for staple commodities and at times setting wages for skilled and unskilled labor. Hammurabi even decreed the fee for surgical operations on man or beast.

Fail to Fix Prices.

"But the truthful commercial documents of those remote centuries make it apparent that royal efforts in behalf of fixed prices were not successful. The economic life of the nation could not be bound by artificial price levels, and the period of the late Babylonian history which is most flourishing shows no record of royal interference in price setting.

"Copper, lead, silver and gold all served as money at various times during the long centuries of monetary development in the Tigris-Euprates valley.

"Wealth had become concentrated in the larger cities, where the banking business was chiefly in the hands of a few important families. These firms were not mere 'money lenders' but bankers in every sense of the word. They commonly lent money at 20 per cent per year.

Old Age Annuity.

"An interest-bearing note or a share in the income of a popular temple could be a valuable legacy left to a dutiful son or daughter. An annuity arrangement for old age comparable to those offered today was known. The recipient of the annuity turned over his properties or the income of specific properties, in return for which he was guaranteed a certain minimum income in food and clothing for the duration of his life.

"Centuries of experience in legal matters had developed a standard, incontestable form of document for every possible form of government.

"Land renting and leasing was a profitable and extensive business.

"The legal aptitude and general shrewdness of the Babylonian business man is attested to by thousands of carefully, often cleverly worded tablets.

"As the three thousand years of ancient Babylonian economic history are pierced together, there is discernible throughout the ages a gradual increase in prices of nearly all staple products as well as in real estate and rents. Fluctuations appear, yet the general trend is upward."

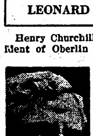
Choosing the Best

By LEONARD A. BARRETT



Henry Churchill King, the late president of Oberlin college, wrote, "The great secret of all living is the persistent staying in the presence of the best — the great facts — the great truths — the great personalities." Life is a struggle to attain a certain ideal. We may be forced to fight our way through many trying situations, but the joy of victory is far greater and more permanent than that contentment which comes from being satisfied with anything less than the highest and the best. Contentment is thus frequently expressed—"To live in a house by the side of the road and be a friend to man." True, but abstract friendship is impossible. Unless some one frequently comes to that house by the side of the road and receives the best water from its cooling spring, or the best help the owner of the house can give, little contentment can abide within its walls. Only as we give to others the best that is in us do we attain the goal of high and joyous living.

In order to give the "best" we first must attain it for ourselves. Why discount our own efficiency and minimize the possibilities of our own happiness by being content with the "second best?" When we seek to satisfy our desire for music, let us endeavor to hear the best. It is far more profitable to hear one great symphony than a number of second rate concerts. It is far more profitable to read one good book, the very best that is possible, than a score of books that contain no great message or commanding purpose.

Environment is an important factor in developing character and determining life's compensations. Why not choose the best possible environment and refuse to sacrifice its value for the gaudy gewgaws of evanescent pleasure.

Living in the presence of the "best" is by no means as expensive as living on lower levels. Most of the money spent today is for worthless trivial things which contribute absolutely nothing to the art of plain living and high thinking. Environment depends not as much upon money as upon our choice of the way we spend our money.

"The great secret of all living is the persistent staying in the presence of the best." Read the best books, see the best pictures, hear the best music, choose the best friends. Staying in the presence of the best is the secret of all successful and joyous living.

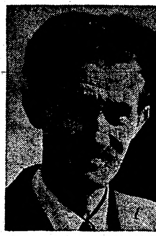
THREE CENT MARRIER



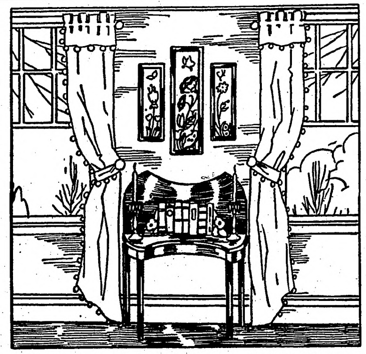
A. C. Hess, a justice of the peace in Reno, Kan., reports a tremendous increase in marriage ceremonies since he established a low rate for his services. For 18 years he had been justice and during that time had performed but four marriage ceremonies, which is not extraordinary when one considers that the village's population is less than 25. The idea occurred to him that if a low charge were made he would perform more ceremonies, so he announced that beginning January 1, 1936, couples would be married at his residence at the rate of only 3 cents per marriage. Since then he has done twice as much business as he did in the 18 years heretofore. His home has been dubbed "cupid's parlor" and Mr. Hess revels in the reputation of being "cupid's right hand man."

Jailed for Failure to Pay

A century ago Indianapolis citizens were put in jail for failure to pay their debts. For several years it was the law that debtors be placed in jail or be kept "within bounds."

The Household

By Lydia Le Baron Walker



The sparkle of clear crystal rods and ball fringe, candlesticks and bookends is as decorative as gay color.

THE fad for a riot of color in decoration is waning fast. The absence of color is in high favor as noted in white decorative schemes. These, however, are so delicate that those only who can afford to keep the rooms immaculate should consider white as a main scheme. In a former vogue, cleansing of decorations was not the problem that it is now. Between that period and this coal and oil have become common heating fuels and the columns of black smoke that rise from chimneys to seep through windows, or pour through them when open, makes it a constant fight to keep rooms spotless. When they are, the radiations and glow of white are as impressive as brilliance of color.

Brilliance of Glass

The absence of color in decoration is found in glass fittings and furnishings, that either sparkle or shine according to their cutting or polishing. Curtain poles in clear glass with ball tips on each end are among the furnishings, as are also glass ball fringes for valances. These sometimes are used to edge draperies also. While style is served in such furnishings, there is an element of fragility and danger of finger and spot marks showing, that are quite balancing items. Color is frequently introduced in the glass to make it continue some special color scheme developed. The colored glass does not have the refractions that clear glass does and so loses that feature of beauty in glass accessories.

Speaking of accessories, clear glass is featured in book-ends of chiseled beauty, or with the softness of rounded designs, or the solidity of angular modern designs. Crystal candlesticks give elegance and grace to accessories in glass, while crystal ash trays of blocks of glass scooped out for ash containers, or in chaste beauty of pattern lend charm to arm tables or smokers' stands.

Blankets and Covers

The uppermost covering for a bed has not one but many names, the latest of which is blanket cover. Bedspreads are frequently diminished to spreads. Other names are coverlet, which is couvre-lit or couvre-pieds in French; and counterpane, also of French extraction, fathered by Latin. The word quilt, sometimes used, is correctly applicable only when the covering is of two thicknesses of material between which is a wadding of some sort. Today we associate the word with the stitchery known as quilting and the verb quilt, signifying the running stitches taken through the textiles and filling to secure them together, usually in decorative designs.

The nearest we come to a bed cover in quilted type is in the Marseilles spread which is seldom seen today. However, in the rotation of fashions the time is approaching when in all probability it will return. These spreads are machine-quilted, having patterns in relief which are developed by outlining designs through the surface and back textiles and the slight wadding between. These white coverlets, it would appear, came into style during the latter part of a past vogue of quilts, and continued on a crest of a wave of fashion for several years afterward. Marseilles counterpanes are handsome and heavy. It was largely due to their weight that their vogue passed. They are similar to ancient quilted materials but in modern disguise. They are made by machinery, and are modern-French in design.

Night Coverlets

The blanket covers of today would simplify the return of these Marseilles spreads, for the former are primarily used as night-time substitutes for elaborate daytime bed covers. It is when the bed is dressed for the night, and the heavy, elaborate, lacey or costly silken spread is removed, that the simple, yet dainty blanket cover is thrown over the bedding. Thus it protects the blankets and provides attractive dress for the bed, distinctly suited to real use.

So popular have blanket covers become that they are used not alone at night but during the day. They are easily home-laundered, and if made of crinkly crepe will need no ironing. For both day and night use silk blanket covers are attractive. They can be the choice of their kind. Center monograming or initialing in contrasting applique or embroidered letters supplies decorative distinction, especially for dainty cotton covers.

—16—

"I shall be. I never appreciated Hortie until now. I was too silly, vain—feather-headed. I have realized it since knowing Marcia."

"We all want to be different after we have seen Marcia," Stanley Heath said gently.

"We don't just want to be—we set about it," was the girl's grave reply.

"Sit down, Sylvia, and let us talk of Marcia," ventured Heath after a pause. "I am deeply sorry if I have wounded her—indeed I am."

The girl searched his face.

"I cannot understand you, Mr. Heath," she said. "What has Marcia done that you should have left her as you did? Hasn't she believed in you through thick and thin? Stood up for you against everybody—going it blind at that? Few women would have had such faith in a stranger."

"I realize that. You do not need to tell me," he answered. "It is precisely because she has gone so far I believed her capable of going farther yet—the whole way."

"What do you mean by the whole way?"

"To the end."

"Well, hasn't she?"

He shook his head.

"No. She has fallen short—disappointed me cruelly. When it came to the final test, her affection collapsed. Oh, she has been wonderful," he added quickly. "Do not think I fail to appreciate that. She has far out-distanced every other woman I ever have known. I simply expected too much of her, doubtless the impossible. Human nature is frail—a woman's heart the frailest thing of all. I have always said so."

"You wrong Marcia," cried Sylvia hotly. "Her heart is not frail. Neither is she the weak sort of person you have pictured. In all the world you could not match her loyalty or the depth of her affection. If after the experience we three have lived through together you have not discovered what she is, it is futile for me to attempt to show you.

"You came into our lives like a meteor—entirely detached from everything. We knew nothing about you and in the face of damaging evidence you offered neither Marcia nor me one word of explanation. Marcia asked none. Without rhyme or reason she believed in you. I had not her faith. I freely confess I thought you guilty. Oh, I liked you sufficiently well to be ready to help you save your skin. But Marcia cared enough for you to want you to save your soul.

"When you were taken ill, we both nursed you—I willingly, she devotedly. Here lay another difference had you been able to detect it. What happened as a result of this enforced intimacy? You know—know far better than I."

"I fell in love with Marcia," replied the man without an instant's hesitation.

"You fell in love!" Sylvia repeated, her lip curling. "You call it love—the poor thing you offered her! Why, Marcia would have gone to the world's end with you, Stanley Heath, had she the right. She would have faced any humiliation for your sake. If prison doors closed upon you, she would have remained faithful until they swung open and afterward followed you to any corner of the earth in which you chose to begin a new life."

"That's where you're wrong, Sylvia," contradicted Heath. "Marcia was not ready to do that. I tried her out and she refused. When I told her I should return to her, and asked her in so many words whether she was willing to face shame and public scorn for my sake she turned her back on me. She could not go to that length."

"Are you sure she understood?" asked Sylvia, stepping nearer and looking fearlessly into his eyes. "There is a shame Marcia never in this world would face for any man; but it is not the shame you have just described.

"It is the shame of wronging another woman; destroying a home. In the villages where we have been brought up, we believe in marriage as a sacred, enduring sacrament—not a bond to be lightly broken. When you offered Marcia less than that—"

"I never offered Marcia any such shameful position, Sylvia," cried Stanley Heath. "I would not so far insult her."

"But you are married."

"That is a lie. Who told you so?"

"The—the wire to Mrs. Stanley Heath—the telephone message. I heard you call her Joan."

"But, Sylvia, Mrs. Stanley Heath is not my wife. She is my young stepmother, my father's widow. I always have called her Joan."

"Oh! I beg your pardon."

"I see it all now," the man explained. "You have entirely misunderstood the situation. I'm a Junior. Since my father's death, however, people have got out of the way of using the term. Sometimes I myself am careless about it. So Marcia thought—"

"Of course she did. We both did. How were we to know?" Sylvia demanded.

"How, indeed? If an innocent citizen cannot visit a town without being arrested as a criminal within a week of his arrival, why shouldn't he be married without his knowledge. Circumstantial evidence can, apparently, work wonders.

Then suddenly he threw back his head and laughed.

"Bless you, little Sylvia—bless you for setting me right. I told you you were a brick and you've proved it. Thanks to you, everything is now straightened out. Here, give me your hand. How am I to thank you for what you have done? I only hope that young Horatio Fuller of yours realizes what a treasure he is getting."

"He does, Mr. Heath—he does," observed that gentleman, strolling at the same instant through the door and encircling his tiny bride-to-be with his arm. "Haven't I traveled half way across this big country of ours to marry her?"

"Oh, we're not going to be married yet, Hortie," demurred the girl trying to wrench herself free of the big fellow's hold.

"Certainly we are, my dear. Didn't I tell you this morning I came to get married? I was perfectly serious. Dad gave me two months vacation with that understanding. I must either produce a wife when I get home or lose my job."

"Looks to me as if you had Mr. Fuller's future prosperity in your hands, Sylvia," Heath said.

"She has. She can make or break me. A big responsibility, eh, little Sylvia?"

"I know it, Hortie," retorted the girl seriously.

"She is equal to it, Fuller—never fear," Stanley Heath asserted.

"I'm not doing any worrying," smiled Horatio. "I—"

The sentence was cut short by the radio's loudspeaker:

"The much sought Long Island gem thief was captured this morning at his lodgings in Jersey City. Harris Chalmers, alias Jimmie O'Hara, a paroled prisoner, was taken by the police at his room on K— street. A quantity of loot, together with firearms and the missing jewels were found concealed in the apartment. The man readily admitted the theft. He has a long prison record."

For a second nobody spoke.

Then as if prompted by common impulse, the three on the piazza rushed indoors.

Elisha was sitting limply before the radio.

"Did you hear that?" he gasped.

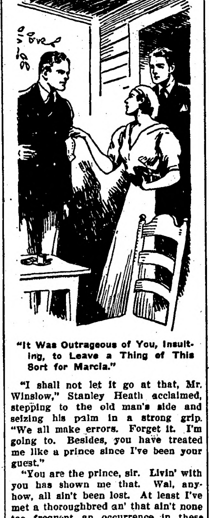
"Well, rather!" Horatio Fuller shouted with a triumphant wave of his hand.

"Ain't it the beateree?" exploded the astonished sheriff. "That sends the whole case up in the air. All that's needed now to make me out the darndest fool on God's earth is for Eleazer's young nephew-lawyer in New York, who's checking up Heath's story, to wire everything there is O. K. If he does, I'll go bury my head. There goes the telephone! That's him! That's Eleazer—I'll bet a hat.

"Hello!—Yes, I heard it.—You ain't surprised? Wal, I am. I'm took off my feet.—Oh, your nephew wired, did he, an' everything's O. K.? That bein' the case, I reckon there's no more to be said. I feel like a shrimp. How do you feel?—"

Elisha hung up the receiver.

"Wal, Mr. Heath, the story you told Eleazer an' me is straight as a string in every particular," he announced. "You're free! There ain't nothin' I can say. To tell you I'm sorry ain't in no way adequate. You'll just have to set me down as one of them puddin'-headed idiots that was over-ambitious to do his duty."



"It Was Outrageous of You, Insulting, to Leave a Thing of This Sort for Marcia."

"I shall not let it go at that, Mr. Winslow," Stanley Heath acclaimed, stepping to the old man's side and seizing his palm in a strong grip. "We all make errors. Forget it. I'm going to. Besides, you have treated me like a prince since I've been your guest."

"You are the prince, sir. Livin' with you has shown me that. Wal, anyhow, all ain't been lost. At least I've met a thoroughbred an' that ain't none too frequent an occurrence in these days."

"What I can't understand, Mr. Winslow, is why you didn't recognize he was a thoroughbred from the beginning," Horatio Fuller remarked.

"You've a right to berate me, young man—a perfect right. I ain't goin' to put up no defense. 'Twas the circumstances that blinded me. Besides, I had only a single glimpse of Mr. Heath. Remember that. After he was took sick I never saw him again. Had we got acquainted, as we have now, everything would 'a' been different. Findin' them jewels—"

"Great hat, man! I had a diamond ring in my pocket when I came to Wilton, but that didn't prove I'd stolen it."

"I know! I know!" acquiesced the sheriff. "Eleazer an' me lost our bearin's entirely. We got completely turned round."

"A thief with a Phi Beta Kappa key!" jeered Horatio. "Godfrey!" Then turning to Sylvia, he added in an undertone: "Well, so far as I can see the only person who has kept her head through this affair is our Aunt Marcia."

Elisha overheard the final clause.

"That's right!" he agreed with cordiality. "The Widder's head-piece can always be relied upon to stay steady."

"Whose head-piece?" inquired Stanley Heath, puzzled by the term.

"Marcia's. Here in town we call her The Widder."

"Well, you'll not have the opportunity to call her that much longer," Heath laughed.

"You don't tell me!" Elisha regarded him, open-mouthed. "Humph! So that's how the wind blows, is it? Wal, I can see this mix-up would 'a' ended my chances anyway. Marcia'd never have had me after this. Disappointed as I am, though, there's a sight of comfort in knowin' she won't have Eleazer neither. He don't come out of the shindy a whit better'n me. That's somethin'. In fact it's a heap!"

CHAPTER XIII

Intense as was the joy of the three persons, who a little later set out toward the Homestead in the old yellow dory, they were a silent trio.

Too much of seriousness had happened during the morning for them to dispel its aftermath lightly.

Horatio, pulling at the oars, was unusually earnest, Sylvia turned the ring on her finger reflectively and Stanley Heath looked far out over the water, too deep in thought to be conscious of either of them.

When, however, the boat swung into the channel, Sylvia spoke.

"Hortie and I are not coming with you, Mr. Heath," she said. "We will stay behind. Only do, please, promise me one thing. Do not tell Marcia the whole story before we have a chance to hear it. There are ever so many connecting links I am curious beyond words to have you supply."

"Such as—?"

"The jewels in the first place. I can hardly wait to have that mystery solved,"

Stanley laughed.

"The jewels are no mystery at all. I can satisfy your mind about those here and now. They were Joan's—Mrs. Heath's. Her maid, Corinne, took them and disappeared. Soon afterward, purely by accident, I met Paul Latimer, a friend who lives on Long Island, and during the course of our conversation, he asked if I knew a good man servant, saying that Julien, their butler, had just given notice that he was to be married to Corinne, the new parlor maid, and return with her to France.

"The woman's name instantly caught my attention.

"Why shouldn't I do a bit of sleuthing on my own account?

"Thus far the detectives Joan and I had hired had made no headway at locating the jewels.

"Why shouldn't I have a try at it myself? I got a boat and cruised along to the Latimers' at whose house I had frequently stayed, and with the habits of whose household I was familiar. My plan was to arrive early in the morning before the family was astir and catch the parlormaid alone at her work.

"Should she prove to be our Corinne, I would boldly confront her with the theft and demand the jewels; if, on the other hand, she turned out to be another person altogether, it would be perfectly easy to explain my presence by falling back on my acquaintance with Paul.

"It seemed, on thinking the matter over, that this would be a far more considerate course anyway than to drag in the detectives, not only because I had no real evidence to present to them, but also because of my friendship for the Latimers and for Julien, who had been in their employ many years. I knew they esteemed him very highly and would be dreadfully cut up should they find him involved in an affair as unpleasant as this one. Besides, I felt practically certain he had had nothing to do with the crime. He was too fine—one of the old-fashioned, devoted type of servant.

"To shame such a man and throw suspicion on him if he were blameless would be a pity, especially just on the eve of his resigning from service. It might mean that instead of leaving with the gratitude and good-will of his employers, he might be sent away under a cloud. I did not wish that to happen.

"Well, my scheme worked to a dot.

"The instant she saw me she knew the game was up, and, without more ado, produced the gems from her pocket, shouldering all the blame.

"Julien, she protested, knew nothing of the theft. He was a self-respecting, honest man. Should he be told of what she had done it would end everything between them. She loved him. Indeed it was because of him she had committed the crime.

"It proved they had been engaged some time and long before had agreed to save their money and sometime pool it so they might be married and buy a little home in France.

what Irvin S. Cobb thinks about:

Racial Hatred.

BEVERLY HILLS, CALIF. —It may be old to you, but it's new out here:

Small Prussian town turns out for traveling circus. Ferocious lion escapes; villagers flee madly. Sinewy stranger grapples, single-handed, with ravening brute; twists its jaws, hammers its nose, boots it back into cage.

Entire community starts jubilation—flags flying, bands playing, burgomaster puts on his high hat, special train arranged for rushing the hero to Berlin to be decorated by Herr Hitler as reincarnation of ancient Nordic demigods, typifying spirit of old German stocks—all that sort of thing.

Irvin S. Cobb

Suddenly hideous discovery is made that stranger's background is not Teutonic, the family name being Ginsberg. Celebration called off; flags furled, bands sneak home, special train canceled, burgomaster has apoplexy.

And next day the local paper comes out with scathing article under the headline, "Jew Attacks Defenseless Lion."

* * *

Criminal Lawyers.

WE'RE a funny people. Did we read where, in some far-off country, men who had access to zoos picked the locks on the cages and freed the man-eating tigers and the bloodthirstiest wolves and the deadliest poison snakes to go forth and kill again, we'd marvel at a land which endured such a thing.

But when in our own land criminal lawyers truthfully boast that, of all the individuals charged with deliberate murder whom they have defended, no single one ever went to noose or chair, and that ever so many more were, by their skill, saved from the prisons where we are supposed to pen our human tigers and wolves and snakes, we give these geniuses our admiration and much free advertising, and young lawyers crave to follow in their illustrious footprints.

We are indeed a funny people—so funny it's hard to decide whether we should laugh at ourselves—or weep.

* * *

Husbands and Wives.

LOTS of matrimony in the news, now that marriage, instead of being a contract, is a ninety-day option.

A Pittsburgh gentleman gets fined for dunking his lady's face in a simmering beef stew. That's no way to treat a lady. Or a beef stew. Take the average lady, and would you care for a beef stew flavored with lipstick, eyebrow pencil, mascara, cold cream, hair dye and three kinds of paint?

A gentleman who's president of the —take a deep breath—American Creative League of Harmony and Music Students, declares if ill-suited couples learn the guitar happiness would return, the guitar, he states, being the most romantic instrument there is. But once, in vaudeville, I saw a peevish helpmate crown friend husband with an inlaid guitar, and it didn't seem to do him any real good.

* * *

Slowing Up Youth.

OBVIOUSLY it's too late to save the confirmed speed-maniacs among the adult population. They won't be with us long, anyhow, and will be missed by but few, if any. Every time one of these madmen whizzes past, I find myself saying to the back of his neck, "Well, brother, glad to have this glimpse at you. Probably I'll not be seeing you again unless I should drop in at the morgue the day you arrive."

But maybe we might help to insure the oncoming generations by inaugurating a definite course of juvenile education. Let's start with the babies; let's make it a fixed and required ritual in every kindergarten, every public or private parochial school—yes, every Sunday school, every Boy Scout camp and at every girl's campfire; every place where youngsters are gathered. Over and over again, let's pound it into them that reckless driving is neither gallant nor smart nor sporting, but that it is stupid and criminal and vicious and murderous.

* * *

Desolation of Floods.

THE first time we went to Venice my wife looked across the Grand canal and said:

"Did you ever see anything like it?"

And, trying to be funny, I said: "Absolutely, looks just like South Third street did during the big rise of 1913. If right now a fellow in a skiff should come rowing up to this window to collect the water-rent, I'd swear I was back home."

That seemed a sorry joke as I read of a monstrous yellow torrent sweeping down on the beleaguered lowlands where my people have lived for nearly a century and a half, bringing ruin on its crest and desolation in its wake.

Surely nature has been pitiless this last year—drouths and duststorms; forest fires and smokepalls; blizzards and icepacks; and now these cruel floods. Still, amid the afflictions, one consoling thought gleams like a star: congress will adjourn pretty soon.

Smoot's Prophecy

WASHINGTON.—Some years ago when Reed Smoot of Utah was a member of the senate where he enjoyed a long and meritorious service, he ventured a prophecy. It was this:

"The cost of government has increased every year, and it will continue to increase. I care not what party is in power, that result will obtain."

As I recall, Senator Smoot's statement was made about eight years ago and it was made at a time when the Republicans, of whom the Utah senator was one, were in control in the senate. His statement came as a result of an immense amount of jibes that were being hurled at the Republican majority. The Democrats were having a grand time, kidding the Republicans who were then in complete control of the government.

Senator Smoot recognized that which few in responsible positions in the government recognized, or if they did recognize the fact, they chose not to admit it. Nevertheless, the senator's statement is true today as it was true when he made it and for many years before.

The Smoot prophecy comes to mind now because of the sudden acceleration of moves to curtail government expenses, to reorganize the scads of New Deal and emergency agencies, to eliminate overlapping functions among these agencies, and, in general, to put the house of government in order.

Two such efforts are underway. One of them was initiated by Senator Harry F. Byrd, Virginia Democrat, who succeeded in obtaining senate recognition of his charges that there was tremendous waste, that there were useless agencies and that, in addition, governmental functions were being generally messed up because none except the old-established units of government knew what they were doing. The Virginia senator obtained adoption of a resolution providing for a general survey and recommendations for the clean-up. It was a situation in which even the most ardent New Dealers could not find an excuse for objecting to it. So the senator took the lead.

Subsequently, President Roosevelt reached the conclusion that something ought to be done in the way of untangling the tangled skein of governmental functions so he proposed a survey under his direction. He appointed a committee of so-called experts to go over the problem.

Thus, at the start, at least, it appears that the taxpayers are going to be favored by a break. I think it ought to be added, however, that no one has had the temerity to suggest that either the Byrd survey or that engineered by Mr. Roosevelt will yield very much.

* * *

Dig Up Helpful Facts

The survey promoted by Senator Byrd will dig up a good many helpful facts but there is every reason to believe that the Virginia senator will find many obstacles placed in his way and that he and his committee will be unable to present any comprehensive statement on their findings to the country in advance of the November elections. The same is true concerning the survey directed by the President, only more so. The cold fact is that there is no chance at all for the President's committee to even approach the stage of making recommendations from their survey until long after the elections are held. Frankly, each of these surveys is permeated with politics, so much so that a straightforward accounting or general description of the affairs of government will not be allowed to become public property and thereby become a campaign issue. Of the two, Senator Byrd's proposal has the better chance, but that is rather small.

Adverting to the Smoot prophecy, it is therefore of no great importance whether a thoroughgoing examination of the governmental structure that has grown up in the last three years under President Roosevelt is made in advance of the elections. These New Deal agencies have been created and these New Deal agencies, like many of the "Old Deal" agencies, are with us to stay and suck up taxpayers' money for quite some time. I need only remind you that we still have in existence the War Finance corporation and the railroad administration that were created as war-time agencies, not to mention a dozen other similar units.

It is possible, indeed, I think it is probable, that there will be a trimming of pay rolls in many of the New Deal agencies immediately after election. There certainly ought to be important curtailment of expenses and of the list of employees, but accomplishing that is a matter much more easily described than done. So, I feel safe in saying that all of this ado about a reduction in governmental swelling amounts to nothing more than just ado.

* * *

New Deal Spirits Rise

In making the statement above that the outcry about reducing the government pay roll and untangling the functions is just so much ballyhoo, I think it ought to be said at the same time that New Deal spirits are rising. There was a time a few months ago when the national trend was decidedly against Mr. Roosevelt. It even went so far as to cause many individuals to say that Mr. Roosevelt would be defeated for re-election. The picture around the first of April was quite different. There is in Washington quite a general feeling that the Roosevelt re-election chances have improved and are continuing to improve. This condition is quite evident to observers continuously on the job here for even in the personal manner of the President himself there is an outward appearance that he believes the situation is well in hand.

As far as I can discover, one reason why the New Dealers feel so much better is that events leading up to the national Democratic convention seem to be cleared of any harassing possibilities.

I am sure that it will be recalled how something like the blues overcame many New Deal stalwarts after former Gov. Alfred E. Smith of New York, 1928 Democratic Presidential candidate, let loose a blast at the New Deal in his Liberty league dinner speech. I happened to be in a position to know that the Smith speech caused all kinds of commotion and fear among New Deal leaders. They know, as everyone else knows, that "Al" Smith has a big personal following. When he threatened "to take a walk," he let loose a declaration that was charged with dynamite and the New Dealers could not calculate how much dynamite.

Now, however, it appears quite certain that much of the danger inherent in the Smith declaration has been eliminated. Notwithstanding the Smith indictment of the President for repudiation of platform promises and his description of the Roosevelt policies as "a national menace," there is going to be a pitifully small number of anti-New Deal Democrats in the Philadelphia convention. The number will be so small, in fact, that however vociferous they become, their shouts will be heard no more than the wail of a child in a storm.

It was to be expected, as I have reported to you before, that the routine type of Democratic politician will forget any differences he has with the New Deal and be regular at convention time and during most of the campaign. That type of politician, be he Republican or Democratic, cannot afford to bolt. If he bolts, he cuts off his own nose and most politicians do not enjoy being de-nosed for that is tantamount to being politically dehorned. So, while the Philadelphia convention of the Democrats may have some seething underneath the surface, it is without the realm of possibility that there can be any important revolt against renomination of Mr. Roosevelt. Likewise, it is just as far-fetched to think that the platform which that convention will adopt for the campaign will not be exactly as Mr. Roosevelt dictates it. Actually, there is nothing on the horizon now to indicate any changes from the way I have just described it.

* * *

G. O. P. in a Hole

Inasmuch as the New Dealers can properly regard their situation pretty well in hand, they naturally can feel a bit cocky over the difficulties in the Republican ranks. First, the Republicans are at a disadvantage in that their convention in Cleveland is to be held at an earlier date than the Democrats meet. This, however, is more real than apparent. It is thus because of the intra-party battles that appear certain to come to the surface at Cleveland. The Republicans are not together, not unified, on anything. A half dozen candidates with appreciable followings are snapping at each other and two or three factions are announcing almost simultaneously what the platform is going to say. It just cannot help leading into a beautiful mess at Cleveland unless the Republican leaders show more intelligence than they have shown thus far.

In the meantime, the Democrats are making note of the various battle charges. You can be sure they will use them. Whoever the Republicans nominate at Cleveland necessarily faces a big fight but as the situation now stands, I think the Democrats will be able to make it an offensive campaign whereas ordinarily the party in power must give over much of its campaigning to a defense. This is true unless the Republicans can get together and take the offensive themselves by criticizing and attacking on a united front.

Of course, much water can run under the bridge before the November election. It is always possible that the party in power can make mistakes, can be led into a blind alley under the political guns of its opposition. The Democrats have made many mistakes already but the anti-New Deal opposition shows no indication of plans to take advantage of those mistakes. So the circumstances, as of this time, give every reason for the New Dealers to feel satisfied with the campaigning up to this time.

As Synonyms Go

By E. P. O'BRYAN

MAX HORWINSKY was a race track tout. He worked with a partner whose name was Dorris. Dorris was just what the average sucker would fall for. She had big brown eyes and was a stunning blonde. Tall and well built, with all the curves necessary to her calling. She was the bait that attracted the big fish.

Max and Dorris had worked out a swell scheme. Dorris would mingle with the men and give one the glad eye. Then a drink at the bar and maybe a date later. Max would manage to barge into the restaurant and suddenly he'd spot Dorris. He'd come over to her table as if he hadn't seen her for weeks.

Dorris would introduce Max to her friend.

"Great girl—Dorris is," Max would say to his new acquaintance. Then, over Dorris's protests, he'd insist on telling how she had picked winners out of the paper. "Five straight she gave me," he'd vouchsafe.

Before the stranger could ask any questions Max would hurry away, saying that he'd like to see Dorris the next day before the race. The gentleman would want to know what it was all about, and Dorris would pretend it wasn't anything much. Just a little system—a sort of a synonym game she'd worked out for fun.

"Oh, I couldn't do that," she'd say when her latest pick-up would want an explanation. "I get it out of the papers—sort of a combination of letters. It never spells out the name of a horse, but there's always a synonym for the word that tells what horse is going to win. It really does. . . ."

Twice in a row on the day I'm telling you about, Max placed a five-pot on horses that the synonym picked, and they won. The fellow who put up the dough was named Ogelby. He was a school teacher from Iowa.

Mr. Ogelby was hot after that. He flashed a couple of century notes and said he'd like to bet it all on the next race, but he'd like to know the system.

"All right," Max says, "Dorris here says today's synonym is 'spice.' How she gets that is from the first letter of the names of the jockeys. Now there's Sam, Pete, Ike, Chet and Elmer. Look at the first letter of each name. What does it spell? S-p-i-c-e, eh?"

Mr. Ogelby looked puzzled. "But how do you arrive at anything from that?"

"Simply this. Here's the program. What horse is running in today's races whose name suggests a synonym for spice?"

Mr. Ogelby read off the names of the horses. When he came to Aromatic he suddenly paused.

"There's your answer," Max said. "Bet that two hundred on Aromatic today and see what happens."

But Mr. Ogelby was a little hesitant. He finally peeled off a sawbuck and gave it to Max. "I'll take a chance on this thing once," he said.

Aromatic limped in eighth.

Max disappeared for a few hours. Finally he phoned Dorris, but she had checked out of the hotel.

"You're not by any chance Mr. Horwinsky, are you?" the clerk inquired politely.

"Yeah, that's me."

"We have a message here for you, sir."

It proved to be a note from Dorris. It read:

"Dear Max. Mr. Ogelby and I are going to be married this afternoon. I wish you all the luck in the world, only that system you figured out for suckers is screwy. I even fell for it myself and bet the bank roll. Hope you make out some way. Dorris."

Three months went by. Max received a letter one day with a check in it for two hundred dollars. The letter read:

"Dear Mr. Horwinsky: I've always felt that I owed you an apology for taking Dorris, who is now Mrs. Ogelby. And I owe you something more. My check is enclosed to cover it.

"I was not satisfied the day you gave me the tip on Aromatic. Being a school teacher, I did not think the word quite suitable for a horse, so I looked around for a better one and found it. Perhaps it did not occur to you that Balmy Day was running in the next race. I put the two hundred on him and he paid twenty to one. What spice has to do with a balmy day, I haven't the least conception, except that at the time I remembered that the air on balmy days of early summer is often spice-like. Anyway, I figured one was as good as the other. Dorris sends her regards.

"Very sincerely yours,
"Horace Ogelby."

Old African Custom

African native customs die hard. The governor of Kenya (Sir Joseph Byrne), when taking an official tour in the gold area, was approached by a number of natives, who expressed consternation about the recent gold workings and feared that they would lose their land. Sir Joseph at once declared that there was no question of any native being deprived of any part of the reserve.

An aged chief stepped out of the crowd and asked the governor to supplement his assurance by swearing according to the custom of the Kakamega tribe. The chief held out a sword and a dog and asked the governor to cut the dog in half with the sword and to sprinkle the blood around. Sir Joseph Byrne tactfully declined the proffered dog and sword, emphasizing that the word of one of his majesty's governors should suffice.

SAMMY JAY TAKES A HAND

SAMMY JAY was bubbling over with excitement as he flew through the Green Forest following Lightfoot the Deer. He was so excited he wanted to scream, but he didn't. He kept his tongue still. You see, he didn't want Lightfoot to know that he was being followed. Under that pointed cap of Sammy Jay's are quick wits. It didn't take him long to discover that the big stranger whom Lightfoot was seeking was doing his best to keep out of Lightfoot's way in which Lightfoot was searching for him. Lightfoot made so much noise that it was quite easy to know just where he was and so keep out of his way.

"That stranger is nearly as big as Lightfoot, but it is very plain that he doesn't want to fight," thought Sammy. "He must be a coward."

Now, the truth is, the stranger was not a coward. He was ready and willing to fight if he had to, but if he could avoid fighting he meant to. You see, big as he was, he wasn't quite as big as Lightfoot, and he knew it. He had seen Lightfoot's big footprints and from their size knew that Lightfoot must be bigger and heavier than he. Then, too, he knew that he really had no right to be there in the Green Forest. That was Lightfoot's home, and so he was an intruder. He knew that Lightfoot would feel this way about it and that this would make him fight all the harder.

So the big stranger wanted to avoid a fight if possible. But he wanted still more to find that beautiful young visitor with the dainty feet for whom Lightfoot had been looking. He wanted to find her, just as Lightfoot wanted to find her, and he hoped that if he should find her he could take her away with him back to the Great Mountain. If he had to he would fight for her, but until he had to he would keep out of the fight. So he dodged Lightfoot and at the same time looked for Miss Daintyfoot.

All this Sammy Jay guessed, and after a while he grew tired of following Lightfoot for nothing. "I'll have to take a hand in this thing myself," muttered Sammy. "At this rate Lightfoot never will find that big stranger!"

So Sammy stopped following Lightfoot and began to search through the Green Forest for the big stranger. It didn't take him very long to find him. He was over near the pond of Paddy the Beaver. As soon as he saw him Sammy began to scream at the top of his lungs. At once he heard the sound of snapping twigs at the top of the little ridge back of Paddy's pond, and knew that Lightfoot had heard and understood.

MOTHER'S COOK BOOK

TASTY GOOD THINGS

HERE is something which will be found new by most of us and is a most appetizing dish:

Egg Noodle Custard.

Take five ounces of egg noodles and cook until tender and well done, then drain. Add two cupfuls of milk and let them stand three-fourths of an hour. Add one-half cupful of sugar, one teaspoonful of salt, one-half teaspoonful of lemon extract and the slightly beaten yolks of four eggs. Beat the whites of the eggs until stiff, add one-half cupful of sugar and fold into the above mixture. Pour into a buttered mold and bake one hour. Serve with:

Yankee Doodle Sauce.

Chop one-third of a cupful of candied ginger fine; add an equal quantity of ground orange rind, using only the yellow part. Add one-fourth of a cupful of pecan meats coarsely chopped, one-fourth teaspoonful of cinnamon if liked, and serve with thick cream to soften.

Spaghetti Caruso.

Take one-half pound each of spaghetti and fresh mushrooms, three-fourths of a cupful of butter or half cupful of olive oil, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one cupful of chicken stock, one-half cupful of cooked chopped chicken livers and parmesan cheese. Cook the spaghetti until tender, drain. Peel mushrooms and cut into small pieces, cook in the oil or butter about ten minutes, all the chicken stock, salt, and cook ten minutes more. Add the spaghetti and chicken liver and return to the heat just long enough to heat thoroughly. Serve with grated cheese.

Macaroni Alabam'.

Cook one-half pound of macaroni until tender, drain; add two cupfuls of milk very slowly to one-half cupful of peanut butter, making a creamy sauce, season with one teaspoonful of salt, add the macaroni and bake one-half hour in a moderate oven. Sprinkle with buttered crumbs mixed with chopped peanuts and brown under the broiler.

CARD AND TUMBLER

TWO objects are required for this trick; namely, a playing card and a small drinking glass. Holding the card between the thumb and fingers of his right hand, the magician sets the tumbler on the card with his left hand.

Then he moves his left hand away. Amazingly, the tumbler balances upon the upper edge of the card and remains there until the performer removes it. The card and the glass may be examined afterward.

During this trick, the spectators see only the front of the card. A glance behind scenes would reveal the secret. The magician keeps only three fingers at the side of the card. His forefinger is back of the card.

Pointing upward, hidden by the card, the forefinger serves as an additional resting spot for the glass. The card and the finger are really the supports.

Let Not Affection Fade

By DOUGLAS MALLOCH

A SADDER sight the sad heart knows
Than petals falling from a rose,
Than dying grasses where a plain
No longer feels the kiss of rain,
Than shattered beauty when a tree
Lies postrate, never more to be:
Such things are even sadder when
They happen in the hearts of men.

For like a rose whose day is done,
Its petals falling one by one,
And like a plain whose withered grass
Shall never green again, alas,
And like a tree whose branches lie
Along the ground, to droop and die,
So is the careless fading of
That thing of beauty known as love.

Let not that sadness come to you
If there is anything to do:
A more forgiving tenderness
To make you love the more, not less,
Any eye for virtue, not for sin,
Since mortals all have both within—
Let every rose fall in the glade,
But not your own affection fade.

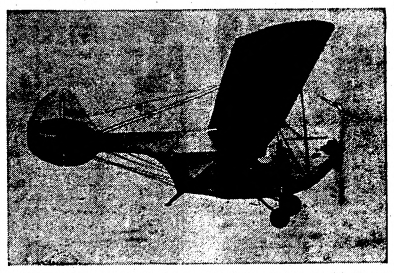
Anyone Could Fly This Plane



THE airplane that is heralded as one that "even grandma can fly with ease and safety," is shown soaring through the sky at College Park airport, Washington, when it was put through tests for the benefit of the bureau of air commerce. The plane was designed and built by A. B. Green, and is a radical departure from usual airplane construction. It has a wing span of 30 feet, can fly 75 miles in an hour on 2½ gallons of gasoline, and weighs, empty, only 465 pounds. This ship will sell for about $700.

MINUTE GERMS SEEN BY TELEVISION AID

Tube Transmits Radio Pictures of Small Bodies.

Philadelphia.—Through a development, television may shortly assist medical science by making hitherto invisible germs visible, according to Philo T. Farnsworth, television pioneer.

By use of the special tube used in transmitting radio pictures, Farnsworth explained, infantile paralysis, cold and other germs can be subjected to ultra-violet light waves which are shorter and smaller than the rays of ordinary sunlight.

Pick Up Germ Images.

Because their size more nearly approaches the size of the mysterious bacteria, he said, the smaller rays can pick up images of the germs. The larger light rays are unable to pick up such images and convey them to the eye, even under the most powerful microscope.

But if this new method works out, Farnsworth predicted, pictures of many living disease-producing organisms will be seen for the first time and the work of fighting human ailments simplified.

Tube Picks Up Rays.

This will be possible, he continued, by placing known cultures of the bugs under a powerful microscope through which a stream of ultra-violet light is passed. The short wave rays then are picked up by the sensitive television tube, which acts much like a motion picture camera in photographing movement of the bacteria.

From the tube the ultra-violet light images are thrown onto a fluorescent screen and made visible.

Not only will medical men be able to see these tiny living things for the first time, Farnsworth went on, but—equally important—they will be able to see them alive.

King Edward VIII Likes Informality in Dress

London.—Just as he greatly influenced the trend of fashions as Prince of Wales, King Edward is already responsible for further changes since his accession to the throne of Great Britain.

The king dislikes unnecessary formality. No changes are likely in any of the great pageants like the trooping of the colors or the state opening of parliament, but on informal occasions it is the king's wish that minimum inconvenience should be caused to all concerned.

When he visited the British Industries fair as the first public engagement of his reign, the king let it be known that salesmen and officials who would be presented to him should wear derby hats instead of the traditional "topper" and cutaway. At the civil investiture at St. James palace members of the royal household were asked to wear morning instead of frock coats, hitherto customary. Except for members of the royal household and some elderly peers, the frock coat is little worn nowadays.

U. S. Ready to Purchase New Type Plane Engine

Washington.—The War department, it was learned, is preparing to place an order amounting to several millions of dollars for airplane engines of a new type which are described as "the most powerful in the world." The placing of the order, it is understood, awaits only the signature of Harry H. Woodring, assistant secretary of war.

Details of the engine development and the name of the manufacturers have not been disclosed, but it is known that tests have been made at Wright Field, Dayton, Ohio, and that the officers assigned to conduct them have urged the acquisition of the engines, as part of the move to strengthen the G. H. Q. air force. Many of the new-type engines are expected to be installed in the aircraft ordered by the War department in December, when contracts were awarded for 115 new attack airplanes and 90 bombers. The 13 of the new bombers being built on the "flying fortress" design, it is understood, each will be powered with four of the new engines.

Whistler Makes Business of Her Trilling Powers

Seattle.—Nobody can tell Miss Lucia Carruthers, twenty-one years old, to go whistle for a living, for she already does. Whistling, says the pretty Seattle girl, is an art.

So she has opened a whistling studio and is building up groups of hobby and professional whistlers. She starts with the scale and breathing exercises, then progresses to bird calls and obligatos, with concert work the final step.

"Whistlers, like singers, must be born with a certain flexibility of the tongue," she said. "I've whistled all my life, but it's only in recent years that I've whistled seriously."

As a background for professional whistling, Miss Carruthers studied music at Washington State college and in Los Angeles.

Lights of New York

by L. L. STEVENSON

Morning mists: Sometimes, there are compensations for getting up in what seems the middle of the night and going down the bay to meet an incoming liner. For instance, the other morning, just enough fog had descended over lower Manhattan to make over the famous sky-line into an entirely new picture. Great buildings seemed to be floating in mid-air while the towers of the Woolworth, Singer and other skyscrapers seemed isolated crags in a sea of vapor. Brooklyn bridge was bits of tracery and the Statue of Liberty, a dim, hovering figure. Huge ferries seemed to come from nowhere and what looked like moving islands were merely barges pushed by tugs. The description sounds tame since, as a matter of fact, it was something to be seen rather than put into words.

• • •

For the working girl: The Society for the Improvement of the Condition of the Poor has figured it out that a girl employed in an office must make an annual expenditure of at least $77.75. Some of the things on the list are four dresses at a total cost of $20; three hats, $6; four pairs of shoes, $12; a winter coat to last two years, at $6.25 a year, step-ins, $1.60; slips, $1.20, and vests, $1. The cost of a working man's clothing is estimated at $58.65 a year and that of a boy, $41 with an outlay of $34.50 for a young girl. A housewife need not spend more than $32.50 a year. But try to convince a lot of them!

• • •

Hat grabbing incident: The hat grabber is again becoming conspicuous. He or she is encountered just about everywhere. Many restaurants that in the lean days dispensed with hat grabbers, have again installed them—which is a sign possibly of returning prosperity, since hat checking concessions cost money. Well, the other night, a dapper young gentleman, after retrieving his hat, coat and stick, thrust something into an outstretched paw. The hat grabber promptly let out a yell. Instead of coin, he'd received a raw oyster. By the time he recovered enough to go into action, the dapper young man had vanished.

• • •

Modern miracles: A friend, who is desirous of remaining anonymous, discovered when he reached his home that he had either lost or had been robbed of his wallet. Having entered a taxi at Broadway and Forty-seventh street, he promptly returned. And lying on the sidewalk, scuffed by many feet, was the wallet which, in addition to valuable papers and identifications, contained $73.

An intoxicated young man fell down the concrete steps of the city subway station at Central Park West and One Hundred and Fourth street. Six men rushed to his rescue. He was badly hurt and the station agent telephoned for an ambulance. Just after he had done so, a well-dressed woman came on the scene. She immediately offered to return to her home and telephone. Assured that an ambulance had been called, she waited until it actually arrived and in the meanwhile made this young fellow as comfortable as possible. Hard-hearted New York!

Travel note: Tourists who return from Caribbean trips find their liquor purchases piled separately from their regular purchases. Presumably, that's for the convenience of the customs gentlemen who have to check to see if the $800 limit has been exceeded. But what I started out to say was that West Indies' tourists can be distinguished from the European kind by their baskets. Few visit the smiling isles without returning with many samples of native handicraft. Whether they learn to carry them on their heads or not is something that hasn't been ascertained.

Science Confirms Belief That Fish Is Brain Food

Chicago.—The tradition that fish food is a boon to mental faculties may not be so far from the truth, according to experiments conducted at Elgin Hospital for the Insane. Certain diets materially affect the mental balance of an individual, it was shown.

Intelligence tests at the end of 12 months showed that those on a diet, heavy in vitamin A, B-1, B-2 and D as well as iron, as found in liver extracts and cod liver oil, had gained the equivalent of 14.15 months of mental age, whereas non-dieters gained only 2.41 months of mental age.

Rooster as Watchdog

Ketchikan, Alaska.—A rooster saved Mr. and Mrs. Carl E. Hansen several thousand dollars and perhaps saved their lives. While the family was asleep early one morning, a fire broke out in a downstairs room. The rooster began crowing loudly, waking the family in time to extinguish the fire before it got beyond control.

MOST every summer I manage to spend a week or so with my good friend Ed Freeman of Green Valley, Maine, and during the course of my visit he invariably provides me with subject matter for at least one story. Last week he told me about Cedric Wigglesworth, the schoolmaster of Cherry Creek.

"He's an old man now, Cedric is. Must be near eighty." Ed stuffed tobacco into his pipe and went on: "Seems like yesterday. Yep, yesterday. In the fall it was, and beginning to get cold. Purty, too. Leaves all red and yellow and orange. Cider time. Yep, cider time.

"Me and Gracie Bartlette had hooked a ride into town with Gracie's paw, old Dan Bartlette. Dan was bringing apples to the mill, and after we left the load he drove down to the post office and to the store. Then's when I first seen Cedric. He came outter the hotel and stood fer a minute on the piazza, talking with Abe Fairbairn, and pretty soon Abe looked across at us an' pointed. Cedric nodded and smiled and came down the steps and headed for our wagon. Folks lounging around watched him and some of them snickered and made remarks about his clothes and his yellow shoes.

"Just as Cedric reached the wagon Gracie's paw came outter the store and Cedric looked at him and said: 'Good morning, sir. Are you Mr. Bartlette the school committee man?'

"Well, Gracie's paw, a stern old boy with a big paunch and a rumbling voice, allowed that he was, and waited.

"'In that case,' said Cedric, 'you're the man I want to see. My name's Cedric Wigglesworth and I understand you're looking for a schoolmaster. I'd like the job.'

"I remember thinking how that was the first time I'd ever seen Gracie's paw smile. And I remember what a howl of laughter went up from the loungers. Then Gracie's paw said: 'Well, yes, son, you heard right. But I don't think you'd qualify. In the fust place, your name's again yuh, and in the second—'

"But the other qualifications were drowned in a howl of amusement from the bystanders. Cedric flushed down to the roots of his hair, and Gracie's paw looked around at them and scowled. He was a fair man, and for all his bluffness he possessed an understanding of human nature. He turned back to Cedric, and he says: 'Son, I'm sorry I laughed that way. Now you climb up there in my wagon and drive along with me a bit an' we'll talk it over.'

He Found Himself on the Ground, Only Half Conscious, and With No Desire to Rise.

"Well, Cedric climbed up on to the seat of the wagon, looking strangely incongruous there, and we drove out of town. Me and Gracie could hear everything that was said. We could hear Mr. Bartlette in his slow, patient way explaining to Cedric that the schoolmaster of Cherry Creek had to have more than book learnin'. He had to have hard muscle and weight, and aptitude in handling his hands, and other things necessary to keep a bunch of wild, half-grown country boys under control. 'The last schoolmaster,' Gracie's paw finished, 'tried to lick Slim Thomas, an' got a broken jaw outter it. He quit.'

"You would have thought that Cedric would know better. But apparently he didn't, because he kept sayin' he'd like the job anyhow, and felt sure he could teach the kids something without having to beat it into 'em. After a while Gracie's paw looked down into his serious, rather effeminate face an' says: 'All right, son. Ef you feel that way about it the job's yourn. But don't say I didn't warn yuh.'

"And so the next day Cedric appeared at the Cherry Creek school. It was kinda laughable, because the kid wasn't more'n 5 feet 8 or 9 inches tall an' musta weighed under 140 pounds. An' them kids he was delegated to teach were six-footers. I mean, the boys. Slim Thomas was 6 foot 2 inches an' weighed around 200 pounds.

"But that wasn't anywheres near as funny as what followed. Cedric surprised everyone. Before a month had passed he had them six-footers eatin' out of his hand and doin' his biddin' like first-class butlers. An, the reason wasn't because he licked 'em, either. He didn't. No, sir, he didn't lay a hand on one of 'em. He simply made 'em like him. They played their jokes and tried to torment him, but he only smiled and took it all in good part, and pretty soon those youngsters began to realize that the new schoolmaster was their friend and wanted to help 'em.

"That is, all but Slim Thomas. Slim never got over the fact that when he put the skunk in Cedric's desk Cedric laughed louder than anyone else. And when he waylaid the schoolmaster the night before the barn dance and accidentally pushed him off Cherry Creek bridge into the water, Cedric thought it was a great joke, even though he was wearin' his Sunday clothes. No, Slim never let up with his plaguing and always hoped some day Cedric would get mad an' try an' lick him. But Cedric never did. Or not till a whole year had passed.

"Folks about the town liked Cedric, too, though they didn't understand him, and this annoyed them. There was a reticence about the lad that sometimes got under their skin. Country folks don't like to think there is anything about their neighbors they don't know about.

"No explanation was offered until after that first year. Then it all come in a bunch. It happened the day after school closed in June. Cedric had failed to pass Slim Thomas into a higher grade and Slim was mad and out for revenge. He was standing with a group of loungers in front of the hotel when Cedric rode into town with Mr. Bartlette. The schoolmaster had a suitcase with him and he was dressed for traveling. As he came toward the hotel Slim Thomas said sneeringly: 'Here comes the sissy. Ain't he the cute one though!'

"No one guessed even remotely at what was to happen. Cedric came on, but instead of continuing into the hotel he set down his suitcase and crossed over to Slim. 'Slim,' he said, 'school is not in session now and no one can hold me responsible for what I'm about to do. Get on your guard!'

"Slim was too overcome with astonishment to reply, and before he could collect his senses something smote him on the jaw with force enough to cause his teeth to chatter. He blinked, but didn't fall. Again something hit him on the jaw, and presently the same something connected with his nose and caused blood to appear. His left eye received the same treatment, and then his right. He choked and sputtered and swore and struck out wildly, but his ham-like fists flayed only the atmosphere. After a moment he felt something in his throat and knew it was a front tooth. Then he found himself on the ground, only half conscious, and with no desire to rise.

"Cedric turned around and stalked over to Gracie's paw. 'Well, Mr. Bartlette,' he says, 'I guess I prove you wrong on both counts. I taught your school without beating up the kids, and now I've licked your town bully.'

"Gracie's paw permitted himself one of his rare smiles. 'Son, I takes off my hat to you. The job's yours as long as you want it, and we're mighty proud to have you as the Cherry Creek schoolmaster. I reckon now us folks can understand what sort of a chap you are.'

"'Which is why,' said Cedric, 'you can all take your job and go to the devil with it. I despise this place and everyone in it, for reasons which you've just stated. I wouldn't stay on here for ten times the salary. Good day, Mr. Bartlette, and the rest of you thick-skulled yokels!'

"And that's the last we ever saw of Cedric Wigglesworth, and to this day none of the folks of Cherry Creek have ever been able to understand the little schoolmaster with the store clothes, which may or may not explain why the town is no bigger today than it was then."

Authenticity of Joan's Sword Causes Argument

The dispute in France concerning the authenticity of the sword of Joan of Arc, now held in the museum of Dijon, is of interest to many Americans who make a visit to this historic site a part of a trip to Europe. The sword is one of the prize attractions of the museum, and dates back to the Fifteenth century, writes a correspondent in the Detroit News.

For the present, the "No men" are capturing most of the publicity, and evidence is presented showing that the sword must have been manufactured after Joan's death. They point out that the decorations of the sword, particularly the costume of the kneeling figure which is engraved on the blade, belong to the 1575 period, while Joan went to her fate in Rouen market place in 1531. Hence this sword was never in her possession.

But the "Yes men" have a plausible explanation, and quote a hitherto unpublished letter, signed by Prosper Merimee, which recently came to light. He suggests that the sword, engraved with the words "Vavcovlev" and "Charles Septieme," was really given to Joan by the Sire de Baudricourt when he lent her a few men-at-arms to escort her from Vaucouleurs to seek the king at Bourges. He declares that she wore the sword, but never used it in battle, and that the engravings which seem to point to a later date—were added after her death when the weapon had already become a relic.

Dade Memorial Park

Dade Memorial park, in Florida, is a memorial to Maj. Francis L. Dade and his company of 103 men who were killed in an Indian massacre. The 80-acre tract, near Bushnell, was purchased by act of the Florida legislature in 1921 and various appropriations were made to improve the site.

Fuel Required by Liner

The amount of fuel a liner requires depends on the size of the ship and on the speed maintained. The Leviathan burned about 900 tons of coal per day. A freight and passenger vessel of about 5,000 tons, in a trip across the Atlantic taking 12 or 13 days, would burn about 30 tons a day.

Woman Patron Buying Ham Asks Butcher to "Burger" It

He was just a country butcher, but he deals with a lot of city slickers and he must be alert to see to it they put nothing over on him. He was discussing the suggestion that many of the customers who come to him are so dumb that he could sell them tripe for porterhouse steak. As an example he explained that a woman came into his shop and asked for a pound of ham. This he cut, and then to his surprise the customer said, "Now please burger it."

The butcher did not grasp the request immediately, and then it dawned upon him that the buyer wanted meat for a hamburger steak. Trying to explain the makings used for a hamburger, the woman became very indignant, saying she knew what she wanted.

Not willing to accept his explanation, he did the next best thing and ran the slice of ham through the chopper, wrapped it up, and the customer went away in contentment. Her subsequent visits to the store were friendly and the subject was never mentioned.—New York Sun.

A GREAT CONTRIBUTION TO EASIER, FASTER MORE ECONOMICAL FARMING

Guarantee—This heavy, Super-Traction tread is guaranteed not to loosen from the tire body under any conditions, and all other parts of the tire are fully guaranteed to give satisfaction.

THREE years ago Harvey S. Firestone conceived the idea that farm work would be easier, faster, and more economical if it were done on rubber.

It was on the Old Homestead farm in Columbiana County, Ohio, which Mr. Firestone still operates, that he directed engineers and developed a practical pneumatic tire for tractors and every other wheeled implement on the farm. The result was a super-traction tire so unusual in design and so amazing in performance that a patent was issued on the tire by the United States Patent Office at Washington.

On tractors, Firestone Ground Grip Tires will do the work 25 per cent faster with a saving of 25 per cent in fuel cost. On sprayers, combines, binders and other farm implements they reduce draft 40 to 50 per cent; do not pack the soil, sink into soft ground or make ruts; protect equipment; do not damage crops and vines; speed up every farm operation.

One set of tires will fit several implements. Tires can be changed quickly from one implement to another. Two or three sets are all you need to take care of practically all your farm implements.

See the Firestone Tire Dealer, implement dealer or Firestone Auto Supply and Service Store today—and in placing your order for new equipment, be sure to specify Firestone Ground Grip Tires on your new tractor or farm implement.

Flandin Calls on Germany for a Showdown

PIERRE-ETIENNE FLANDIN, French foreign minister, speaking at Vezelay, demanded in the name of his government that Adolf Hitler lay his cards on the table, and intimated that unless Germany gives concrete proof of no aggressive intentions in central or western Europe, France will decline to negotiate further with the reich and will prepare for war. Flandin made it clear that France will stand firmly with her allies, the little entente and Russia. Said he:

M. Flandin

"The Fuehrer says Germany does not want to take anything from anybody, but he already had said that after the Saar plebiscite. He then also reaffirmed the Locarno treaty, which since has been repudiated. In the name of the integral sovereignty of the German people, does the Fuehrer intend, when he thinks the moment favorable, to bring up the Danzig question?

"When he proposes a nonaggression pact with Lithuania does he accept definitely the status of Memel or is he just stalling for time to prepare new deeds of force in violation of treaties?

"If Germany intends to assert her right to possess and exploit colonies, what colonies is she going to claim?

"Is it not significant that at the moment Hitler launches his peace appeal, Nazi propaganda is redoubling in Austria, Danish Schleswig, Polish Silesia, among the German minority in Czechoslovakia, and even in German Switzerland?

"Yes or no, does Hitler renounce annexation and even full absorption of the populations of these territories into the reich, or does he proclaim that these are internal affairs of the German people in which he does not intend to let other nations meddle?

"If the latter case be the truth, then we understand why Germany is rearming at a record pace."

Germany Almost Solidly Supports Hitler

GERMANY'S men and women to the number of 44,389,140 declared by their votes in the reichstag elections that they supported the policies of Hitler. Only 542,898 had the nerve to vote against the reichsfuehrer, and a still smaller fraction refused to go to the polls. Among the latter were the former Crown Prince Ruprecht of Bavaria and his wife.

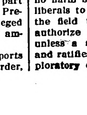
Hitler's victory was thus extraordinarily complete, and the Nazis celebrated it with wild rejoicings in Berlin and other cities. It was the culmination of a three years' campaign in which the leaders sought to persuade the population of the reich that only Hitler could save the country from great danger. According to Berlin correspondents, there was a difference of opinion there as to the influence the triumph would have on the fuehrer. Some said it would stiffen his back and induce him to ride roughshod over the powers which objected to his scrapping of the Locarno pact. Others said the election would make him feel so strong he would be willing to make a concession to his neighbors in an effort to help establish "the new order in Europe" to which he referred so frequently in his election speeches.

The new reichstag will be the largest in history, having about 740 members. Most of them will be officials of the Nazi party.

For the first time in the history of aviation a polling booth was established in the air. It was aboard the new dirigible Von Hindenburg, whose 104 passengers and crew voted solidly for Hitler. The Hindenburg and the Graf Zeppelin cruised over the Saar and the Rhineland all day long.

Japan Expects Trouble With Soviet Russia

THOUGH Koki Hirota, the new Japanese premier, said a few days ago that while he was in office there would be no war, it is evident his government really is looking for serious trouble with Russia. This feeling is expressed by Eiji Amau, spokesman for the Tokyo foreign office, who said: "Japan must prepare for Soviet aggression."



Eiji Amau

Recent activities indicate the Reds are availing themselves of the critical situation which developed after the recent military revolt in Tokyo and are increasing the strength of their troops along the Manchukuan border."

Amau said the "recent Soviet policy has been to fire on any persons near the border." He said he regards this as rather strange behavior on the part of a "friendly neighbor." He said Premier Hirota had protested the alleged action to K. K. Yurenev, Russian ambassador to Japan.

Almost every day there are reports of clashes on the Mongolian border, each side blaming the other as aggressors. The Outer Mongolian government, reinforced by conclusion of its mutual assistance pact with Soviet Russia, dispatched a note to the Japanese-sponsored state of Manchukuo, declaring its readiness to resist any invasion.

Italian Bombers Wreck Second Ethiopian City

MUSSOLINI'S air bombers were busy again in Ethiopia, virtually ruining Harar, second city of that country, with a downpour of explosives. Most of the populace had fled when scouting planes gave a warning of what was to come, so the casualties were few. An official telephone message from Harar to Addis Ababa said fifteen incendiary bombs struck the Egyptian Red Cross hospital and others hit the Ethiopian Red Cross hospital.

A French mission, the French consulate, the Ethiopian radio station and prison all were reported officially to have been ruined.

The attack on Harar, coupled with a heavy bombardment of Jijiga, fifty miles east of Harar and a center of Ethiopia's southern defenses, raised native fears in Addis Ababa that the capital itself might be the next target

Government in Business Decried by Committee

ACCORDING to the committee on government competition with private enterprise, whose report has been made to the President, that practice is wholly destructive except in situations where the public welfare can only thus be served. "The government's function," the report said, "is to protect economic activities of its citizens and not to supplant them."

The committee unanimously agreed that only under the following conditions is the government justified in entering into competition with private enterprise:

1. When required to assure adequate preparation for, and creation of, the facilities for national defense.
2. For the conservation of natural resources.
3. When private enterprise fails to conduct needed scientific research and exploratory activities to advance industrial development, or in the interest of public health and safety.
4. When private enterprise fails to render a service necessary for the general welfare.

Alien Deportation Bill Reported to Senate

DESPITE vigorous opposition, which will reappear on the floor of the senate, the senate committee on immigration and naturalization reported favorably the Kerr-Coolidge alien deportation bill, which Secretary Perkins has been trying to get through congress for three years. It will give her and two other members of an interdepartmental board discretionary power to harbor radical and even criminal aliens, otherwise deportable, in this country. The same bill recently was reported favorably by the house committee.

Secretary Perkins

Pending action by congress on the measure, Secretary Perkins has been holding up the deportation of some 2,800 aliens mandatorily deportable under existing law, contending that they are "hardship cases." Some are radicals, some have criminal records, and others entered the country illegally. By "hardship cases" Secretary Perkins means that they would be separated from family ties or put to some other inconvenience.

Senator Robert R. Reynolds of North Carolina, Democrat, not long ago attacked the action of Secretary Perkins in holding up the deportations and denounced the pending bill as a "sham and a mockery" and a subterfuge to shield all kinds of radicals, criminals, and dependents unlawfully in this country.

Secretary Perkins refused to produce information respecting the 2,800 "hardship" cases until Reynolds introduced a senate resolution, whereupon she permitted him to examine the records.

Third Party Is Favored by Farmer-Laborites

FORMATION of a third national party was suggested in a resolution adopted by the Farmer-Labor party convention at St. Paul, Minn., and the delegates noisily welcomed the hint that Gov. Floyd B. Olson of Minnesota might be its Presidential candidate in 1940. Just now Mr. Olson is after a seat in the senate. The resolution was adopted by a vote of 368½ to 250½ although several leaders pleaded that the move be put off for four years.

Governor Olson said privately that in his opinion the resolution could do no harm since it does not commit the liberals to putting a national ticket in the field this year. Neither does it authorize formation of such a ticket unless a second convention convenes and ratifies any action a proposed "exploratory conference" may take.

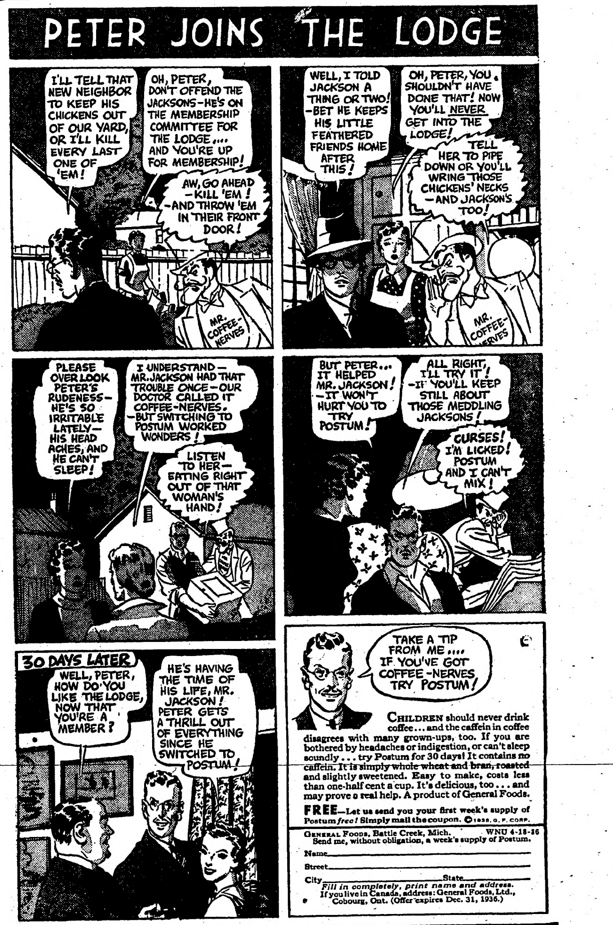
Emperor of Iran Permits Women to Doff Their Veils

Reza Shah Fahlevi, emperor of Iran, finally has assented to the proposal that women be allowed to unveil. They are not required to do so, but no hindrance may be placed in the way of those who wish to discard the age-old custom of their land. This innovation marks the end of the seclusion of Iran women, and undoubtedly will be hailed as the beginning of a new era in the lives of these women.

LONG SENTENCE

"Ulysses," by James Joyce, is believed to contain the longest sentence ever written in any novel since the introduction of punctuation. It is composed of more than 12,000 words, says Collier's.



PETER JOINS THE LODGE
I'LL TELL THAT NEW NEIGHBOR TO KEEP HIS CHICKENS OUT OF OUR YARD, OR I'LL KILL EVERY LAST ONE OF 'EM!
OH, PETER, DON'T OFFEND THE JACKSONS—HE'S ON THE MEMBERSHIP COMMITTEE FOR THE LODGE.... AND YOU'RE UP FOR MEMBERSHIP!
AW, GO AHEAD—KILL 'EM!—AND THROW 'EM IN THEIR FRONT DOOR!
MR. COFFEE-NERVES
WELL, I TOLD JACKSON A THING OR TWO!—BET HE KEEPS HIS LITTLE FEATHERED FRIENDS HOME AFTER THIS!
OH, PETER, YOU SHOULDN'T HAVE DONE THAT! NOW YOU'LL NEVER GET INTO THE LODGE!
TELL HER TO PIPE DOWN OR YOU'LL WRING THOSE CHICKENS' NECKS—AND JACKSON'S TOO!
MR. COFFEE-NERVES
PLEASE OVERLOOK PETER'S RUDENESS—HE'S SO IRRITABLE LATELY—HIS HEAD ACHES, AND HE CAN'T SLEEP!
I UNDERSTAND—MR. JACKSON HAD THAT TROUBLE ONCE—OUR DOCTOR CALLED IT COFFEE-NERVES.—BUT SWITCHING TO POSTUM WORKED WONDERS!
LISTEN TO HER—EATING RIGHT OUT OF THAT WOMAN'S HAND!
BUT PETER... IT HELPED MR. JACKSON!—IT WON'T HURT YOU TO TRY POSTUM!
ALL RIGHT, I'LL TRY IT!—IF YOU'LL KEEP STILL ABOUT THOSE MEDDLING JACKSONS!
CURSES! I'M LICKED! POSTUM AND I CAN'T MIX!
30 DAYS LATER
WELL, PETER, HOW DO YOU LIKE THE LODGE, NOW THAT YOU'RE A MEMBER?
HE'S HAVING THE TIME OF HIS LIFE, MR. JACKSON! PETER GETS A THRILL OUT OF EVERYTHING SINCE HE SWITCHED TO POSTUM!
TAKE A TIP FROM ME.... IF YOU'VE GOT COFFEE-NERVES TRY POSTUM!

CHILDREN should never drink coffee... and the caffein in coffee disagrees with many grown-ups, too. If you are bothered by headaches or indigestion, or can't sleep soundly . . . try Postum for 30 days! It contains no caffein. It is simply whole wheat and bran, roasted and slightly sweetened. Easy to make, costs less than one-half cent a cup. It's delicious, too . . . and may prove a real help. A product of General Foods.

MELVIN PURVIS, formerly America's ace G-Man, who directed the capture of Dillinger, "Pretty Boy" Floyd, "Baby Face" Nelson, and others. Mr. Purvis reveals here the methods used in capturing criminals. Names and places have been changed. In today's story Mr. Purvis tells of the hunt for the "McManus Train Robbers." The G-Men received a "tip-off" that the gang had headquarters near a small Wisconsin town. Purvis had just located the gang's hide-out, and had sent wires calling the G-Men, when . . .

WHY THE GANGSTERS WERE BAFFLED BY MELVIN PURVIS' WIRE: Melvin Purvis had sent two wires, by different telegraph companies—and had sent alternate letters from his message in each wire. The two telegrams looked like this:

HVLCTDCAUHNOTE
TEIHMNTETNGTUVS
AEOAEMMNSAGUME
MWT3EATNOIHPRI

Which, when decoded by the "alternate letter" method, read:

HAVELOCATEDMCMANUS

Safetygrams

The chance taker is the accident maker. The driver who takes chances must expect to take the consequences. This is where law enforcement should be rigid and firm. When a man knows he is doing something wrong, when he knows he is violating the law, when he takes his own life into his hands and, in addition, gambles with the lives of half a dozen other persons, when such an individual is apprehended, the law should give him the full measure.

Why take foolish chances? Let us respect the rights and privileges of others and save our own lives.

Automobiles kill people - yet these deaths by automobiles can be prevented by expert care and courtesy ou the part of the automobile driver and the pedestrian.

For Unskilled Road Workers

Due to the fact that a large number of persons are declining farm jobs and are expecting to be placed as common laborers on road construction projects, officials of the District Office of the National Re-employment Service at Thief River Falls wish to expressly state that all persons who are to be employed as common laborors will be those from the relief rolls and those borderline cases on the relief rolls. Only those non-relief persons skilled in the operation of road building equipment and who have had experience in some particular phase of road construction will be placed.

Farm hands are greatly in demand and persons desiring this type of employment are requested to contact the nearest NRS Office at once. With the approach of the sugar beet season the beet workers are in demandand the office now lists furnished by the American Crystal Sugar Company of farmers desiring beet workers.

Nelson Filed For Governor

Martin A. Nelson of Austin filed for Governor of Minnesota on the Republican ticket Wednesday, April 22. The following is his statement issued in connection with his filing.

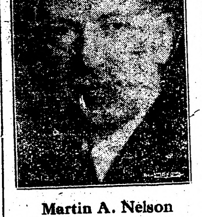
"The Republican Party of Minnesota has proposed to the people of a progressive, forward-looking program, and I commend it to the thoughful study of every individual in the state.

"One grave responsibility will develop upon the next state administration. After allowing for needy relief, proper upkeep of our educational system, and other necessary functions of state government' there must be a sharp reduction in running expenses. Strict economy must be rigidly enforced at every point.

"No budget was ever balanced under circumstances which saw more money going out than came in, or where funds were spent faster than ,hey could be collected. Such practice must be stopped. Private business should be encouraged to expand, and new enterprises should be induced to come to Minnesota. By these means - economy and increased payrolls - Minnesota will soon begin to show some of the results that have been achieved in our neighbouring states.

"At the same time Minnesota must continue to maintain its position in the forefront of progressive states of the union and to render to its people those services which the people and the march of events in a new era demand.

"To these ends I pledge myself."



Martin A. Nelson

Card of Thanks

We take this means of expressing our heartfelt thanks to all those who made donations toward the benifit dance given us at Holt on Saturday evening. Especially do we want to thank those who spent their time and efforts in getting up this big party for us. Also those who furnished the music.

We extend to you all, thanks for this and for your kindness and help during the past few months.

Often as we walk along the old home town we hear some one make the remark that they are going to pull out as they do not like the country nor the people. But it has been proven that there are no people on earth that will do as much for you in time of need as the good people of the old home town and community. They cheerfully give for a good cause and deserve the greatest of thanks and credit for their good deeds.

We thank you one and all.

Mr. and Mrs. H. O. Hanson, and family.

Authorizes 1936 Pageants

At its regular meeting last week the Conservation Commission authorized E. V. Willard, commissioner of conservation, to proceed with preparations for the staging of historical pageants within Itasca and Jay Cooke state park.

The action was taken when Earl Barker, president of the Northwefs Historical Society, gave evidence of guaranteeing payment of any deficit up to $2,000 and a pledge to advance cash not to exceed $500 to defray preliminary expenses.

Previously the Conservation Commission had agreed to stage the pageants only if local sponsors would gaurantee payment of deficits up to $2,000.

The Commission adopted a resolution protesting against the 1936 order of the Interstate Commerce Commission placing an 11.2 cent surcharge per ton of iron ore and asking a reduction of basic freight rates.

The resolution, introduced by Richard Bailey, stated that many state-owned lands now lie idle because of "excessive" transportation costs from the mines to the Lake Superior docks and because of the drop in the market price of iron ore. According to the resolution, the value of low-grade ores is being jeopardized by the surcharge ordered by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The Commission recognized for "purpose of conference" Minnesota Game Wardens' Union No. 20062, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. Members of the Commission will confer with the duly authorized spokesmen of the Wardens' union on all matters "within the scope of the laws of Minnesota under which the Commission operates."

Plans of the division of game and fish to plant an additional 20,000 acres of black amber and 15,000 to 20,000 acres of millet and buckwheat in cooperation with Minnesota farmers were indorsed by the Commission. The millet and buckwheat will be planted mainly in the northwestern counties of the state. The value of black amber cane for feeding game birds has already been demonstrated by previous experiments.

Sanford Tverstol of the Bloomwood 4-H Club, Argyle, was elected president of the Marshall County 4-H Club Council at a meeting held in the Warren Court House, Saturday, April 18. The meeting was called to order by County Agent, Mr. Reierson. An informal introduction of the leaders followed, each telling the club they represented and some interesting facts about their organization.

Mr. and Mrs. H. O. Hanson and family were pleasantly surprised on Saturday evening when the people of Holt and community gave them a benifit dance here at the community hall. A very large crowd was in for the doing and also several people from out of 'town.

They were presented with a cash purse which was taken up to help defray the expenses which they have had in connection with sickness and hospital care this winter.

Load Limit On County Roads

Sheriff To Enforce 3 Ton Load Limits In County.

Due to the unusual snow conditions of all roads in Marshall County this spring and fearing that heavy loads will result in the loss of existing gravel the County Board decided to restrict all graveled roads in the county to a three ton load limit, including vehicle.

Sheriff O. C. Toftner will work in conjunction with the county highway department in enforcing this restriction and all violators will be held responsible.

Load limit signs are now being posted by the Highway Department and the roads will be restricted until conditions permit heavier traffic.

Bought Property Here

Mrs. L. Wegge returned here last week from Crookston where she spent most of the winter. Mrs. Wegge made a deal recently in which she became the owner of the H. B. Young home here. She is now moving there and the people of Holt extend her a warm welcome as one of the residents here.

Rocket Ship Soars 700 Miles an Hour

Expert Works on Plane to "Send to Moon."

Washington.—Jules Verne's fantastic story of a trip to the moon by rocket may be nearer reality than many believed.

Dr. Robert H. Goddard, who has worked 15 years on a liquid propellant rocket, reported that his experimental ships had reached a top speed of 700 miles an hour and that he hoped soon to surpass this record.

His work was so exceptional in this previously neglected field that three years ago Col. Charles A. Lindbergh helped the Clark university physicist obtain a grant from the Guggenheim foundation. After experiments in a specially-constructed laboratory at Boswell, New Mexico, Doctor Goddard broke a self-imposed silence to discuss his process to date and the problems yet to be solved.

Beats Plane Record.

Already Doctor Goddard has attained a speed which is more than double that breath taking record set by Sir Malcolm Campbell when he blurred across the flats near Salt Lake City, Utah, at slightly better than 300 miles an hour. The fastest seaplanes, stripped down to tremendous powerhouse motors with gnat-like wings, still have to streak along at 500 miles an hour.

Yet fellow scientists are not certain that this extraordinary speed of 700 miles an hour can be maintained long enough to throw a rocket out into space where the earth's gravitation would not pull it back again.

The "motor" used by Doctor Goddard is powered by a combination of liquid oxygen and gasoline.

Discussing the chamber or "motor" of the rocket ship, Doctor Goddard said the one decided upon was 5¾ inches in diameter and weighed five pounds. The maximum lift obtained was 289 pounds and the period of combustion usually exceeded 20 seconds. The lifting force was found to be steady.

Problems which still have to be conquered before Jules Verne's fantasy can come true include stabilization and construction of a ship that is lighter than the present experimental rockets which weigh from 58 to 85 pounds.

Use Small Gyroscope.

Best results so far have been obtained by inserting a small gyroscope in the rocket. This is the same device that is seen in some children's mechanical toys or on ocean liners which attempt to overcome the rolling motion.

"Inasmuch as the rockets started slowly, the first few hundred feet of the flight reminded one of a fish swimming in a vertical direction," wrote Doctor Goddard in a section describing actual test flights.

"The continually increasing speed of the rockets, with the accompanying steady roar, make the flights very impressive. In two flights the rocket left a smoke trail and had a small, intensely white flame issuing from the nozzle, which at times nearly disappeared with no decrease in roar or propelling force."

The white flashes below the rocket, he said, were explosions of the gasoline vapor in the air.

Doctor Goddard said that the greatest height obtained in any of the tests was 7,500 feet. He said he wanted to work out certain fundamental construction problems before attempting a ceiling record.

Besides the Guggenheim foundation, Doctor Goddard's experimental work has been supported by Clark university, the Carnegie Institution of Washington and the Smithsonian Institution.

Lips and Not Teeth What Make Music Go 'Round

San Francisco.—Lips and not teeth are what make the "music go round and around," according to Dr. Charles J. Lamp, director of instrumental music in San Francisco schools.

After eight years of scientific research, Doctor Lamp decided that it is lip texture that qualifies every band instrumentalist from tuba player to the saxophonist. He has taken sharp issue with the old school on this subject.

According to the old-time authorities, "the trumpet player must have thin lips and regular teeth; the baritone and bass players thick lips and irregular teeth; the piccolo, clarinet and saxophone players, overlapping teeth, and the cornet and trombone players, good and even teeth."

Doctor Lamp experimented for four years and found that anyone with the proper lip texture need not worry about the teeth in his ambitions to become proficient with brass instruments.

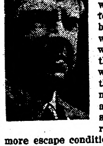
ESCAPING REALITY

By

LEONARD A. BARRETT

An English poet who died about a century ago wrote, "Life is but thought:" so—

Let the rain fall, and the flood descend
And drown Reality—
I'll sail away in the ark Pretend,
I in the ark Pretend
On my Alpine ecstasy.



Very interesting and perhaps fascinating, but scarcely possible. It just will not work. No one can escape reality. Imagination may create the ark Pretend in which we may sail away to ecstatic reveries, but sooner or later, we must land somewhere. We get something of a shock when we realize that the landing place is not an Elysium paradise but rather the stern cold world of reality. We can no more escape conditions involved in the cross purposes of a social order than we can escape the unalterable facts of the cosmic universe. In spite of this truth, however, many persons earnestly endeavor to live in the world of unreality which is expressed in the little poem, and "sail away in the ark Pretend to some Alpine ecstasy."

Very interesting is a study of the methods used by some persons to escape reality, to get away from the world of facts and hard knocks. The most common method is creating a wish-world, living a life of make-believe; constructing a dream world severed from ordinary and common relations. This is the most dangerous method of "trying to escape," and not infrequently results in mental disorder. Another method of escape is drowning all sense of reality by the use of opiates which lull one to sleep, or those soporific drugs which only stupefy. Others more sensitively organized, seek refuge in complete isolation, like the mystics of long ago.

The effort to escape reality is neither unnatural, nor particularly dangerous. It is the methods used to effect that escape that are harmful. Every person wants to get away at times. The pressure of meeting life's problems gets too intense, and our "nerves" cry aloud for relaxation and rest. Some physicians advise a complete change in one's environment as a remedy for the effect of over-strain. Travel may bring this result. Music, art, and even the development of one's hobbies have a most salutary effect. The fact remains; there is only one way to escape, and that is to march straight up to the problem of reality and master it. Any condition, however grievous, may be altered by our mental attitude toward it.

A problem is solved not by running away from it but by staying with it. Because men and women stayed with their problems and mastered them, we have our finest music, best literature, and noblest art. Not trying to escape reality but mastering it, develops a type of character upon which the future security of our civilization depends.

The Household

By Lydia Le Baron Walker

WITHOUT being in the least selfish, there are some ways in which a person should consider himself or herself first. This would seem on the face of it to be practically impossible, but on further consideration, the truth of the statement becomes apparent. Time to do the work of your particular job, is one of these items of unselfish consideration of yourself first. Those who have definite hours of work or business hours that are specific, do not have this consideration come into their problems. It is settled by the firm or person who engages them.

Often to insure no deviations from the prescribed hours, time clocks have to be punched. But even when no such mechanical timekeeper enters into the case, the fact that keeping strictly to opening and closing times, and luncheon periods, is essential to a task makes those engaged in it realize that failure to conform to regulations may cost them their jobs.

Keep Faith With Time.

It is when you are master of your own time, as is the case with homemakers, artists, many professional persons, and those in various forms of business, that keeping faith with time frequently has to bear the brunt of seeming selfishness. Everyone who has been over-persuaded to let a task of importance remain undone in order to fill in a table of bridge, or do some other interesting thing to gratify and satisfy an importuning friend, knows it would have not have been selfish to refuse, however it might have appeared.

It is fortunate for a homemaker, that so much of her work is flexible, that she does not have to be as adamant in apportioning her time as do those who are in the business world that is business for themselves whether at home, at a studio, or in rooms taken in the hopes of seclusion from interruption.

Another matter in which an aspersion of over-consideration of yourself may be claimed wrongfully, is when you refuse to tax your strength beyond the limits of good health by keeping late hours. Pleasures within reason are a necessity of health and should not be neglected. But when a person finds that continued late hours make a difference in efficiency the next day, curtailing the length of them, or cutting down on the frequency of such evenings, is most certainly legitimate. You must "keep fit" or eventually lose out in your work. It is imperative to think of yourself first in this matter, but it is not selfish to do so.

Home Management.

Scientific housekeeping can be carried to such an extent that it conflicts with home comforts. This is nothing new, although minute budgeting enters into the complications now as it did not do in bygone days. Or if it did it was under the name of good management, not cold inexorable figures. In good management was included the manipulation of funds on hand to include such things as were of significance at the time with an eye to further manipulations when other pressing items of cost loomed up. In budgeting, there is the original schedule to be followed, come what will. So for home comfort a mixture of modified budgeting and old-time good management is a combination to be recommended.

Apart from things monetary, a feature that is better today than in the past is the relaxing of the bi-yearly house cleaning. Vacuum cleaners and modern improvements in home equipment enter into this equation. It is not necessary to have rooms torn up as they were when carpets were taken up, and furniture left in disarray for days while the entire house was scoured and scrubbed preparatory to putting down the beaten carpets and restoring the rooms to order. The next generation may not know anything about these discomfiting experiences.

Satisfying Experience

However, there was a satisfaction in the knowledge that everything in the whole house was in "apple pie order," according to reports of the older generation. Greater still must have been the appreciation that this particular household cataclysm was done for six months at least. It was a period especially dreaded by the men of the house, who were robbed of their comforts during the episode.

While we are freeing ourselves from these things, we can have others intrude the home to interfere with comforts. If there is one thing that a home means it is sanctuary, where mental and bodily comforts combine to give it the right atmosphere.

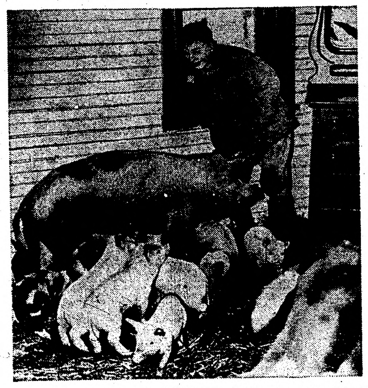
They Kept the Pigs in the Parlor



The floods which brought death and destruction to many parts of the East had many curious after-effects, but few as strange as this. Anxious to save his livestock from the raging waters, farmer Doka, near Mountain View, N. J., "invited" the animals to share his home with him. Madam Sow and her litter of little porkers were welcomed to the guest bedroom by Doka's young son, Joseph. So it was "Pigs in the Parlor," until the waters subsided.

—1—

The house stood alone on a sand-dune overlooking the sea—dark, deserted, and silent, except for the swish of the rain blowing against its shingles. Wet to his skin, and shivering, the Duke struggled to pry open a window.

From his dank coat pocket, the Duke drew a cheap jackknife and a tiny searchlight. With these in his hands, he turned to look toward the highway. It was invisible, two hundred yards from the porch on which he stood, winding over and around and about these dunes.

The Duke's thumb pressed the button, and, momentarily, the ray revealed waving wet beach-grass, and a single scrub pine bent in the wind. Then, carefully, he began cutting away the dry putty that held a pane of glass. It was slow work. "Why don't I break the damned thing?" the Duke asked himself, and, a minute later, felt the unshattered glass drop into his hand.

It was easy to open the window, then, and easy for a slim and agile man to climb through. Once inside the house, he paused. Would the electric lights be working, and would it be safe to turn them on? Why not? Half the summer residences in Southampton had been opened for the season. Even an observant passer-by—if there were to be one—would think a brightly lighted room less remarkable than a furtive ray. The Duke touched a switch his searchlight had disclosed beside a door.

It was exactly the sort of room he had expected—a luxurious breakfast room in a luxurious summer residence. Most of the furniture was covered, but a gay breakfast table stood in the center, and, beyond it, was an open door to a pantry. The Duke walked through, and into the kitchen, turning on lights as he went. "Guess they're going to open the house pretty soon. After all, why should they mind an extra week-end guest?"

He grinned, and anyone who had seen that grin might have found it hard to mind. It was an ingratiating grin, in a pleasant, likeable face. A lean face, weather-beaten and a little boney, but with large, kind, steel-gray eyes, surmounted by a thatch of unruly brick-red hair. The Duke's trim figure stretched a tidy six feet above the worn soles of his untidy boots, but his gray suit, though worn, too, and wet, was well cut and well made, revealing square shoulders and firm muscles.

"Wonder if there's any grub," said the Duke.

All the kitchen shelves bore bright-colored tin boxes, with bright lettering, but they were empty. The bread-box was empty, of course; no use opening that. But above the shelves was a cupboard, and in that cupboard were rows of canned things—each can neatly wrapped in paper—sardines, anchovies, caviar, chicken, ham, tongue—all sorts of things. "Hospitable people," said the Duke. "I wonder where they keep the coffee."

Thirty minutes later, His Grace had dined sustainingly, if not well. Half the contents of the pot of coffee still bubbling on the stove had warmed him comfortably, and he washed the dishes. Then he put everything back in place, turned out the lights, and, whistling merrily, went upstairs.

At the top of the steps was a kind of library—book-lined, with doors on either side, and, at its end, windows facing the sea. Even through the blackness, the intruder could discern the almost luminous white of breaking waves.

Again, he touched a switch, and, this time, lights sprang into being in shaded table-lamps, doubly shaded now by winter wrappings. A fire had been laid in the grate. He lit the fire, and a cigar, and then opened a door on his right.

This was a man's room, gracious and inviting. The Duke felt the mattress drawn back over the footboard of the bed, and, sniffing a pungent odor of cedar and camphor, turned his attention to a closet across the room. A very large closet, with an electric light in it, and built-in drawers, and a cedar chest. Atop the chest were two pairs of slippers, and above it hung the only garment visible, a blue-striped dressing gown of soft, light flannel. His own apparel still clinging damply, the Duke took the dressing gown and slippers back to the blazing fire, and, standing luxuriously before it, changed his clothes.

Still neat, he carried the gray suit and the wet undergarments back to the bedroom, folded the trousers carefully, and laid them on the box-spring. With one hand, he flung the mattress into place over them.

He returned to the fire, stretching himself lazily in a huge, over-stuffed chair. Outside, the storm was growing steadily worse. Wind-flung against the windows, the rain kept up its incessant swish. A little puddle formed on one of the sills. The Duke mopped it up with an old cloth that had been spread over the big chair, and looked through the glass into a cluster of bushes, illuminated from the windows, that tossed their tops frantically, as though moved by wild despair. "It's a filthy night," the man in the dressing gown thought, as he sauntered back to the crackling logs, drawing contentedly at his cigar, and pausing to take a book from the loaded shelves. "A filthy night."

In the thick of it he had been an hour before. Penniless, overcoatless, trudging along the cement-paved road from Bridgehampton, five miles to the east. Was it five miles, he thought, or fifteen, or fifty? On foot, he had left New York that morning just after daybreak. Jobless and flat broke.

For a month—all through April, in fact—the Duke had tramped the streets looking for "a regular job." "What the h—l makes me want to keep straight?" he had asked himself, again and again. "That's all right for guys with an income. If somebody'd started me in a rubber-tired pram, and wheeled me into college, and out again into papa's office—sure, I'd run straight. Why not? Who couldn't be a knight in armor? But being a knight without armor—that's different. When you get dumped into a fight, naked, with nothing but your bare fists, and the whole world coming at you with brick-bats and brass knuckles, what a d—d fool you are to stick to the Marquis of Queensbury Rules!"

Still, he had stuck—reasonably, at least—in the face of what seemed almost a conspiracy of discouragement. Fired out of Hollywood for a theft of which he was innocent as an unborn babe. "All right," he had said; "I've got a few hundreds saved, and I'll go East, and start all over again." Confidently, he had left the railway station in Chicago, only to have his pocket picked before he had got as far as the hotel. He had nearly frozen in Chicago. He had nearly starved. And then he had hitch-hiked to New York, riding freights when he could. A pal had christened him "the Duke," because of his clothes, and his English, and the grand manner he had acquired in Filmdom.

New York—with those Hollywood shoes wearing thin, and that Hollywood gray suit, that had cost $125, getting frayed and baggy. Part of a jobless army in a city without jobs. He had eaten his overcoat—or the proceeds from it, at any rate—and paid the last dime for a bunk in a flop-house.

A love of books, a sense of humor, and the wanderlust—these he had inherited from an Irish father, whose name was Francis X. Gilbert, and whose proudest boast was that he came from the University of Dublin. He had died in China, nearly six years ago, leaving the seventeen-year-old boy, Barry, to fight his way from Hong Kong to Hollywood, and from Chicago to New York. And so Barry had crossed the Queensboro Bridge to Long Island, and picked up a truck, and charmed the driver into buying him a pretty good lunch at Huntington. Bay Shore in a passing car, and Sayville on foot, and another truck to Bridgehampton, where he had lost his bearings and tramped back miles before he found himself again on the edge of Southampton.

It was black night, and beginning to rain. A cold wind had sprung up from the northeast. An endless, winding road, and wind-and-rain-swept dunes, with solitary houses. Grand houses they were, all of them. A few had lights inside—and dogs wandering about, as he had discovered in the course of two desperate excursions. Most of these dwellings were dark and vacant. "Houses without people," the Duke had muttered, still not-too-resentfully, "and people without houses. It doesn't seem fair."

His teeth were chattering by now, and his feet squished in his wet shoes. And this house had seemed so utterly deserted, so entirely safe and secure. "Ten o'clock," said the Duke. "What's the chance of anyone finding me in there tonight? And, if they do, it's better than freezing to death. I'll be on my way again at daybreak."

Now, fed and warm, he was growing drowsy before the fire. "It must be swell to live like this all the time," he brooded, dreamily. "I wouldn't break into anybody's house if I had one like this. Gosh, I guess I'll sleep here. It's warmer than the bed, and I've got a long hike ahead of me in the morning."

His head fell forward, and his eyes were closing, when he heard an automobile door slam, and, an instant later, voices and the shuffling of feet on the porch directly beneath him.

The Duke sprang to the electric switch.

Fast he moved, his wits worked faster still.

"No," he thought; "that won't do. If the lights go out, they'll know there's something wrong!"

The breakfast room window—that was it! But not in dressing gown and slippers. "Damned fool, to take my clothes off!" thought the Duke. Who were these people, anyway, driving up to a closed house at this hour? Thieves? Stragglers, like himself? Hardly—in a big limousine like that he glimpsed hastily from the window.

Well, what next? Jail, probably. How long could they give a man for unlawful entry? "Damn!" said the Duke. And then he heard the lower door open, and a woman's voice in the hall. "Maybe I can talk my way out," he thought, and started down the stairs. "Who's there?" he called, bravely, as his feet touched the first landing.

A man answered.

"Willetts," he said. "Willetts, the butler. Is that you, Mr. Ridder?"

And the lights went on.

Standing there, on the landing naked except for the dressing gown, the Duke found himself facing a party of four. Willetts, with his hat in his hand, squat and powerfully built and ludicrously bald. Another man in a chauffeur's uniform, and two women—one quite young, and the other middle-aged and stout. They seemed propitiatory, and the fact gave him instant courage.

"Is that you, Mr. Ridder?"

The question had been asked first in the dark, but now it was repeated in a glare that made every face plainly visible. The butler didn't know Mr. Ridder, then. That was "a lucky break." It would give him time to dress, and get away.

"Yes," he answered, quietly. "You're a little late, aren't you?"

"Sorry, sir," said the butler. "I didn't have any idea you'd be here, sir. Your mother said you wasn't coming until tomorrow. Evans had to take 'em down to the ship—her and your father, sir—and then he had to go back to the hotel, and pick up me, and cook, and the maid. The storm didn't help, neither, and we stopped at Patchogue for dinner. I hope you ain't going to be put out, sir."

MINNESOTA NEWS

Howard Lake—Mr. and Mrs. Charles Erdman, living near here, became parents for the nineteenth time when a son was born to them.

St. Paul—Minnesota's relief bill for this year will require an expenditure of $13,433,970, L. P. Zimmerman, director of the state relief administration, reported.

Fergus Falls—Workmen making the rounds in the cemetery here, found a grave which had been opened by ghouls and the casket exposed. Authorities said the body apparently had not been disturbed.

Anoka—Plans for erection of an 80-foot forest service lookout tower at the Anoka game reserve to provide better protection against brush and forest fires have been completed by the state conservation department.

Minneapolis—Professor C. R. Stauffer, University geologist, said the continued cold in Minnesota might indicate another glacial age, but urged residents not to worry. If it does it porbably won't be here for 25,000 years.

Norwood—Nerda Herrman, 4, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Herrmann, was alone in her house when she discovered smoke. Breaking a window, she called to her parents, at chores, and they called the fire department.

Moorhead—The Clay county treasurer will distribute $173,378 to the political subdivisions as their share in the last quarter's tax collections. This amount is $17,000 less than was available last year due to delinquent tax collections.

Rochester—Governor Floyd B. Olson has returned to Rochester following a brief session of the state executive council at the capitol, for examination and resumption of treatments for the stomach ailment for which an operation was performed last December.

Faribault—Voters of Faribault will decide on a sewage disposal plant at a special election called for May 5. The city council called for the election after 1,500 petitioners demanded that an ordinance providing for the bond issue be either suspended or offered in popular referendum. The council chose the latter.

St. Paul—The state executive council authorized sale of $1,050,000 in certificates of indebtedness to provide additional funds for distribution to Minnesota's 87 counties. With the $4,468,000 issue recently sold the new one will make a total of $5,518,000 in certificates sold for relief purposes since the first of the year.

Bemidji—Evidence that wolves are destroying the few caribou remaining in the United States has been gathered by Gustav Swanson, biologist. The caribou were found in upper Beltrami county north of upper Red Lake. Last spring six were seen, but only four remain in the area at present. One seen by the biologist had been wounded by wolves.

Duluth—When tourists comment on the sleekness, vim and vigor of deer and moose hereabouts, residents will credit the dietician for the smug appearance of the beasts. Because of heavy snow, feeding the animals was a major problem this winter for Warden Supervisor H. E. Statler and his aides. So he called in the men of science. A deer biscut was compounded with properties capable of appeasing the deer palate and depleting its physical condition.

Brainerd—Striped and pocket gophers and wood-chucks will lead precarious lives this spring and summer. The county board of Crow Wing county has decided to pay bounties again this year on the animals. This means pocket money for rural boys and girls who last year earned $1,564.78 in their hunt for the animals. The county board will pay the same bounties as of last year, 3 cents for ordinary striped gophers, 5 cents for pocket gophers and 10 cents for woodchucks, the bounty being paid during the months of April, May and June.

Minneapolis — Minnesota Republicans will send an uninstructed delegation to the national convention in Cleveland in June, but a majority of the delegates will be warmly receptive to the candidacy of Governor Alf Landon of Kansas. Conventions were held in all the state's congressional districts to name their delegates as follows: First district—Harry E. Rasmussen, Austin publisher and Morris Owen of Winona. Second district—J. F. Koehen, Montgomery and Mrs. Percil Stephenson, Fairmont. Third district—Julian Sletten, Minneapolis and R. G. Thoreen, Stillwater. Fourth district—Mrs. C. M. Irvin and Charles M. Orr. Fifth district—Totten Heffelfinger and Walter Lundeen. Sixth district—Dr. Paul H. Andreen, Cokato and Edward Vandersluis, St. Cloud. Seventh district—E. V. Cliff of Ortonville and J. C. Morrison. Eighth district—James G. Early and Roy Ranum, Cloquet. Ninth district—Roy E. Dunn, Pelican Rapids and Mrs. T. Reep, Thief River Falls.

Redwood Falls—An important addition is soon to be made to Redowod Falls' fire fighting equipment. The city council has placed an order for the new pumping unit and within a few weeks it will be received and placed in service.

Wadena—A truck loaded with hay burst into flames while parked near the house of Archie Larson, farmer near here. A volunteer fireman took a high-powered rifle and punctured the gas tank enabling others, who had feared an explosion, to push the truck away from the house.

WELL SUITED

"Please, ma'am," said a hesitant voice, as the housewife opened the door, "I've come from the labor exchange to apply for the position of housemaid."

The housewife looked puzzled.

"Are you sure you've come to the right house?" she asked the girl.

The latter confirmed the address.

"But I do all the work myself," replied the housewife.

"My word, ma'am," exclaimed the prospective applicant, "I'm glad they sent me here. It sounds just like the sort of job that'll suit me."

SURE WINNER

"What do you do when a woman asks your advice?"

"Switch off to the subject of her millinery."

Not Realistic

In a college class in short story writing one young man had read his story and was listening to criticisms from the class.

"Not realistic," said one member.

"On what do you base your criticism?" asked the professor.

"Why in one place he said the beautiful young girl sat ready and waiting when he came to get her to go to a dance."—Independent News.

An Epigram From the Bench

"Dat wasn't a bad epigram of de judge's," said Plodding Pete.

"What did he say?"

"Thoity days."

"Dat ain't no epigram, is it?"

"Sure it is. I asked a fellow what an epigram is; an' he says it's a short sentence dat sounds light, but gives you considerable to think about."

Not That Kind of a Show

"This world's a stage," said the ready-made philosopher.

"Mebbe so," replied Farmer Corntossel. "But it ain't any minstrel show. Business ain't arranged so that the middleman always gets the joke put on him while the men at both ends of the line do the laughin'. Not yet."

Mistaken

A man had been riding in a smoking car, and when the train stopped at the station he went out on the platform and took deep breaths of fresh air. In his enjoyment he said to the brakeman: "Isn't this invigorating?"

"No, sir," was the reply, "this is Cochecton."

An Easier Way

"A girl doesn't necessarily have to cut off her nose to spite her face."

"Say the rest of it."

Difficult to Follow

The clergyman was addressing the bride and bridegroom.

"It is your duty to follow your husband wherever he may go, and to sustain him in all adversity."

"Rather rough on me," said the bride. "Jim's a dirt-track rider."

Is Bible Reading Champ; Holds Record of 125 Times

The story of the Bible is one that never grows old to Mrs. Kibble Comer, eighty-nine, of Sherman, Texas. In 78 years of steady reading she has read the New Testament 125 times, the Old Testament, 63. She started her Bible reading at the age of twelve, when illness kept her from attending a church rally, but illness since then has seldom interrupted her favorite pastime. "We had no Sunday school literature when I was a girl," she said. "We just memorized five or six chapters of the Bible each week." At fifteen she had memorized half the New Testament. She believes the present generation is not as faithful to Bible teachings as hers.
